Yesterday marks Ursinus' Fifth annual CoSA

By Tyler Wetzel
tywetzel@ursinus.edu

After countless hours of hard work and an entire day dedicated solely to Ursinus' longstanding tradition, Celebration of Student Achievement Day (CoSA) has been acclaimed another success by both faculty and students.

For those not familiar with the event, CoSA is a day-long campus-wide event aimed to engage the entire college community in discussion and celebration of any form of student accomplishments occurring anytime throughout students' college careers.

According to Greg Weight, Coordinator of Student Fellowships and Scholarships at Ursinus and the head coordinator of the event, CoSA began four years ago. Weight states, "It came about because we wanted to provide students with an opportunity to share their accomplishments with their fellow students and with the rest of the Ursinus community." When asked if it had developed from its original definition since its original debut at Ursinus, Weight agreed: "I think it has expanded to include more definitions of what students can achieve, particularly outside of the classroom, so we have student organizations and performances included."

Students – both presenters and observers have shown an overall positive response to the large event. Caitlin Dalik, a senior who presented her honors research representing the Media and Communications Department reflects on the general idea of CoSA and its effectiveness: "I think CoSA is a great idea. It gives students who don't necessarily have an outlet for their achievements to have a day to commit to sharing all the work they have done which may have gone unnoticed. I think it's a neat day where everyone can celebrate their academic achievements."

In reflection of CoSA and his past experiences, Garavel states, "I regret not participating in CoSA my freshman year. I did not go see a presentation and just took the day as a day-off from school. While this was nice, the next year I still made it to the presentations

I wanted to, yet had lots of free time. I didn't spend all-day going to presentations, but saw the ones I wanted to, and it turned out to be a great experience."

Dean Nolan named Vice President of Student Affairs

By Ashley McComeskey
asmccomeskey@ursinus.edu

On Thursday, Apr. 8, Dean of Students Deborah Olsen Nolan was named Vice President of Student Affairs by President John Strassburger.

In a campus-wide email sent last week, President Strassburger said, "She has developed an environment which fosters student achievement and has done so with professionalism and great warmth. Dean Nolan and her entire team are highly supportive of all students," he admired. "We could not ask for a better student life team."

Dean Nolan explained that the new title was up for debate for awhile before President Strassburger made it official. "It's exciting! But I was also kind of resistant, because I didn't want the title to make me less approachable," Nolan clarified.

Students have not had that concern though. Sophomore Katie Hausman spoke of her experiences with Dean Nolan, "She's extremely easy to talk to, and hilarious. She'll do anything to help you. She totally deserved [her promotion]. She's awesome."

Danielle Chmelewski, a junior, agreed, "I think [Dean Nolan] really understands the student's perspective. She relates to us students really easily. ... I know times when I have had a problem and I've gone to her and was able to just talk to her about personal stuff. She's just a good mentor and she has a lot of good insight."

Dean Nolan joined the Ursinus Staff as an assistant dean

John Corson announced as Ursinus Interim President

By Shane Eachus
sheachus@ursinus.edu

"Really I am just honored and flattered to have been asked to serve in this role." These are the words offered to Ursinus College students and faculty, from the man with whom our institution will soon be entrusted for an undetermined amount of time.

On Wednesday, Jun. 30, 2010 Ursinus College will say goodbye to current President John Strassburger, as he steps away from the college as full time president. President Strassburger's departure will leave behind a legacy of progress for Ursinus and campus wide improvement. Filling these shoes will be a difficult task, in step John Corson. Corson will be assuming the role of Interim President of Ursinus College effective Thursday, Jul. 1, 2010, while the Presidential Search Committee continues its task of finding a permanent replacement for President Strassburger and his 15 years of service to Ursinus.

Corson, a light-hearted and entertaining man, whom many on the campus will remember for his introductory speech the day President Strassburger announced his intention to step down, will soon be bridging the gap between Ursinus College presidents. Corson will bring years of experience from the business world and over 20 years of experience as a member of the Ursinus College Board of Trustees. Corson, a graduate of Williams College, and a member of the aforementioned

International News with Lisa: Earthquake in China, crash in Russia

By Lisa Jobe
ljobe@ursinus.edu

Monday, Apr. 12

WARSAW, Poland – Poland began a week-long period of mourning on Monday for President Lech Kaczynski, who died in a plane crash in Russia on Saturday morning. The president's body was returned to Poland on Sunday. Some 100,000 Poles gathered in Warsaw on Sunday as the president's body was taken to the presidential palace. The cause of the crash is still unknown; however investigators say the aircraft's flight data is in good condition and began examining the data on Sunday. Ninety-five others died in the crash, including Kaczynski's wife and other top military officials. They had been traveling to Russia to mark the 70th anniversary of the Russian massacre of Polish prisoners-of-war that took place during World War II. Russian President Dmitry Medvedev has appointed Prime Minister Vladimir Putin head of the inquiry commission. In Poland, Parliament Speaker Bronislaw Komorowski took over as acting president, and elections must be held within 60 days.

CHINA – Around 400 people were killed and thousands are feared injured after a magnitude 6.9 earthquake struck China's western Qinghai province. The town of Jiegu was worst hit by the quake; most of the town's buildings have collapsed and landslides have blocked roads. By Wednesday evening, the local airport was running on emergency power, bringing in rescue crews and sniffer dogs to search the rubble. In all, 5,000 rescuers trained for earthquakes have been dispatched from other provinces, along with supplies such as medicine and blankets. Low temperatures are a concern for survivors, in a mountainous region where overnight temperatures drop below freezing.

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan – On Friday, Kyrgyzstan's deposed president, Kurmanbek Baikyev, officially resigned and fled to neighboring Kazakhstan as part of a deal brokered by leaders of Russia, the US, and Kazakhstan. As part of the agreement, Mr. Baikyev had to leave without his family, some of whom have already been arrested on various corruption charges. On Tuesday, Mr. Baikyev had announced he would formally step down if the interim government promised the safety of himself and his family. In response, Roza Otunbayeva, the leader of the interim government, said they would guarantee Mr. Baikyev's safety – but not that of his family members. Mr. Baikyev fled the capital city of Bishkek when protests over his rule turned violent. Ms. Otunbayeva's provisional government, which took control after the violence subsided, wants to be able to prosecute Mr. Baikyev for the deaths of 80 people in the violence. Kyrgyzstan, which is located in Central Asia, is home to a US airbase central to operations in Afghanistan.

MOSCOW, Russia – The Russian Foreign Ministry announced Friday that it is suspending adoption of Russian children by American families until new rules covering the adoptions can be created. Last week in news-in-brief, The Grizzly covered the story of 7-year-old Russian boy Artyom Savelyev, whose American adoptive family put him on a plane to Moscow by himself. His adoptive mother claimed the boy had psychological problems and she could no longer care for him. The incident sparked a firestorm in Russia. The U.S. Embassy in Moscow says that there is little reason for concern, and that the current suspension should not affect the long-term ability of American families to adopt Russian children. A State Department team will travel to Moscow next week to work out an agreement to allow adoptions to continue. Russian officials are proposing a treaty that would "allow monitoring of children after they are brought to the United States."

SouthEast Asian Student Association presents "Tour of Asia" to students and faculty

By Mike Delaney
midelaney@ursinus.edu

Lower Wismer experienced an Asian Invasion last Friday, Apr. 16, when the SouthEast Asian Student Association hosted their annual Tour of Asia dinner and show. Running from 5:30 until about 8:00, Tour of Asia offers guests a unique array of Asian cuisine, followed by a series of performances from the campus' own Asian-themed clubs.

Dinner included a variety of dishes to choose from, each offering a different flavorful experience. Three basic meats, being beef, pork, and chicken, could be found in the Bi Bim Bop, Ma Po Tofu, and the Chicken Curry, while the white rice and vegetarian Lo-Mein rounded out the food groups.

A sugary treat called Bubble Tea, which featured tea, milk, and tapioca in a single tantalizing concoction, was also available.

Hosts Danny Tomblin and Serena Mithboukar kept dinner-goers entertained with trivia questions focused on Asian dining, such as the proper use of chopsticks, and gave away prizes throughout the night.

At around 6:30 the performances began, starting with a Korean dance medley to a number of modern songs, followed by the Japan Club presenting a Yosakoi Dance, which is a highly energetic choreography harkening paying homage to traditional festival dances in which performers may wear traditional happi coats. These acts were quickly followed up by Jacqueline Chu's rendition of the song "Can't I Love You" by Korean singer Seo In Young.

Kyoko Yamashita, Ayaka Kitashima, Nanase Inoue and Yuki Izumisawa sang "Nada Sou-sou," a touching song by Japanese vocalist Rimi Natsukawa, which they performed somberly in their matching yukata.

However, the girls quickly changed into shorts and t-shirts and got the audience clapping along as they danced to the "Oha Rock" by Japanese idol Shingo Katori, also known as Shingo Mama.

The Ninjutsu Club performed a martial arts demonstration titled "Shinobi X," which involved numerous well choreographed self defense sequences, sending a number of participants flying across a padded floor, much to the audience's delight.

Techniques became more and more varied as the martial artists placed each other in arm locks, twirled bo staffs, and evaded knife strikes with great ease, no doubt impressing their onlookers.

A comedic video selection composed by Eddy Almonte, Mai Guss, Jacqueline Chu and Carmen Cheng was next presented, highlighting the stark differences between Asian and American lifestyles, such as shopping, talking to teachers, and dating.

Further gags included learning to speak Chinese, which is a very complicated language involving numerous ways to pronounce the same vowels. And last, but not least, was a rendition of Korean variety shows, where contestants must answer trivia questions in rapid succession, facing grueling punishments such as eating mouthfuls of wasabi.

Tour of Asia was wrapped up with their traditional fashion show, featuring over 20 student models showing off their garments from across Asia, including China, Japan, Korea, and India.

Though the catwalk lasted only a few minutes, the models, as well as dinner-goers, happily stuck around Lower Wismer for a good while taking pictures and commenting on their favorite acts.

Without a doubt, everyone is looking forward to next year's Tour of Asia with great fervor.

John Strassburger 5K run is a success

By Mike Delaney
midelaney@ursinus.edu

Main Street was backed up on Sunday, Apr. 18, as spectators watched nearly 150 people from the Ursinus Community walk, jog, and run down the sidewalk as part of the John Strassburger 5K charity. The event, orchestrated by sophomore Emily Patrick, was part of her business and economics class, where students were broken into teams with the goal of raising the most money toward charity with only so much in funds to start out with.

This 5K race is only one in a long line of charitable runs performed at Ursinus, most of which have been big successes. Patrick and her team felt that getting the campus involved in a charitable act reflected President John Strassburger and honored everything he's done for the college.

"I emailed President Strassburger on the day he announced his retirement," Patrick explained, "and he loved the idea of holding a run in his honor." Strassburger was also allowed to choose the charity this run would benefit, and decided on Meds and Foods for Kids (MFK), which provides food, medicine, and other necessities to children in Haiti. The charity was started by Dr. Patricia Wolff, a professor of pediatrics at the Washington University School of Medicine, who's also a good friend of President Strassburger's. MFK is also well known for its innovative solution to starvation- a cheap drink known as Medika Mamba, which is derived from peanuts, full of nutrition and without expiration.

"The 5K was a much bigger success than expected," said Patrick. "We hoped to get 50 runners and walkers total, and instead had nearly 150. Probably the fact that President Strassburger's name was attached to the event got people to come out and show their support."

In total, 85 runners and 70 walkers signed up and made donations to the event. The race began at the Water Works Park, which is located on 1st Avenue near the Trappe Shopping Center, and followed a path down Main Street, taking a right at Wawa, and circling back through neighborhoods to the park for a grand finale. Runners took off at 1:00 in the afternoon, and made it back to the starting line within an hour. Junior Justin Garavel finished first and set a new course record in sixteen minutes and thirty-three seconds.

The Strassburger 5K run has earned around $2,500 at this point, but Patrick's team is still collecting donations, and considering future fundraisers. This year they have already sold sushi and California tortillas, and on the day of the run they sold pizza, donuts, pretzels, and Rita's water-ice. Team member John Ryder is also responsible for the 5K t-shirts, which were sponsored by the Beach Net baby food company.

Other team members who made the run possible include Katherine Frazier, Greg Kristofor, Tiernan Grehl, and Garret Washington, who worked to contact sponsors, organize the registration, gather supplies, and sell t-shirts.

Overall, this event was a huge success, and while Patrick and her group are unsure if they will be able to host the run in years to come, they are looking forward to at least one more fundraiser this semester to continue aiding Meds and Foods for Kids in President Strassburger's honor.

ing it is easier 'said than done,' Lee wishes there would be "more performances throughout the day so that more people [could] come. It seems that there is always the choice of seeing poster presentations or the performances. Why not make it possible to see both by reconfiguring the schedule?"

Adam Rimshaw, a junior who presented on behalf of the Chemistry department identified that student participation is the biggest concern regarding the event: "It's a great idea. However, ironically, the students seem to be the issue. I commend many of the efforts that have been taken to hopefully make it a successful event, but the biggest issue is of course attendance. One solution might be to have it take up more than one day. That way people may be able to go to more things, perhaps even things outside their immediate area of study."

With every originally scheduled class postponed to a later date, all students were encouraged to use the time to attend presentations of their peers. In asking if there were any specific ways he would hopefully see CoSA develop in the future, Weight replied that he "would like to have more students attend presentations and support their peers; we're using Facebook more this year to help facilitate that. We welcome suggestions on how to improve the event."

For more information on how to become involved next year, students can email studentachievement@ursinus.edu or visit the CoSA website online within the Research section of the UC Gateway.

Presidential search committee, took time from his day of visiting Ursinus to sit down and talk about his job that begins in just over 2 months.

Throughout the course of the interview, Mr. Corson made a point of mentioning the fact that the current state of Ursinus will allow for his time here to go relatively painlessly. "The school has a lot of positive inertia moving it forward; in the right direction...I'm not looking to do anything significant or specific other than to be supportive of the various constituencies here that need support," said Corson.

When asked of his plans regarding his time as Interim President, Corson spoke highly of the state of Ursinus, "The place is in wonderful shape, the campus is beautiful, the buildings are spectacular, and we're not in a real big building boom, aside from [the Berman Museum]." He went on to conclude about his role that, "As an interim I don't feel that it's my job to start any new programs or initiatives, mainly because I won't be here to see them through until the end, but also because everything is already running so smoothly and so well."

As far as familiarity with Ursinus life goes, Corson feels he has a good pulse of the Ursinus community. A parent of an Ursinus graduate himself, Corson understands the various concerns of parents and students alike here, and says he will be doing his best to assist the school in any way a president would need to during his tenure as Interim President.

For Ursinus, the campus should be prepared for much of the same: much of the same pride in Ursinus, from our President's office, much of the same familiarity between students and administration, much of the same thing that brought so many of us here to Ursinus. Next semester expect to be seeing a new, friendly face on campus. Corson, always quick to offer a joke and a smile, has given assurance that when his time comes to step into office, he plans on being around, routinely, much like President Strassburger has been in the past.

to Student Life in 1986. Working alongside Todd McKinney and Kim Taylor, she described her start at Ursinus with a smile, sharing stories and photos of her time working in Residence Life.

In 1996, Nolan was appointed Dean of Students and Associate Dean of the College and has since been working as an advocate for student achievement.

"I love the unified focus we have here [at Ursinus]. We're all so connected," she confessed. "I'm really proud of what this place is, and what our students do. Everyone has so much commitment. I'm so proud to be a part of it; I won't go anywhere else."

Nolan works constantly to implement positive changes in the student life programs on campus, and is responsible for things like Late Night Lower, and other programs that encourage students to be engaged outside of the classroom.

McKinney, Associate Dean of Students and Director of Leadership Development and Student Activities, has worked with Nolan for the past 20 years. He explained that Nolan has been involved in everything from student judicial meetings to new student orientation. "Anything that touches base with students, we collaborate on," he said.

Nolan admitted that along with her new title came a heavier schedule, but now she is able to give more input and opinions at a higher level. While she is busy with meetings for most of the day, she still finds time to attend student events at night. "I try to manage my time so that I still have accessibility and visibility," she explained.

McKinney said, "I think we'd be hard pressed to find a Vice President as dedicated as Dean Nolan is. She gives a hundred percent, all of the time."

He continued, "Dean Nolan was doing things that a normal Dean of Students wouldn't do. So really, her title just finally caught up with her responsibilities."

The Grizzly only has two issues left! If you are a senior, consider submitting a letter on your experiences at UC. We want to hear the good, the bad, and the ugly. Please e-mail kacallahan@ursinus.edu no later than Monday, April 26 for consideration.

The amount of work and time that have gone into each project presented yesterday was clearly immense. A senior representing the Dance Department, Roger Lee, reflected on the amount of time it took to complete his project. When asked specifically, he frankly stated, "A lot of time! We have been rehearsing the swing piece since August. I have been choreographing this new work throughout the spring semester and my honors research has been going on since August and is just now in the finishing stages."

After each year's event, many students can be heard discussing its effectiveness and how it can be developed into something better. Understand-

Career Corner: Human Resources

By Career Services
career@ursinus.edu

Human resources (HR) is a general term meant to cover a wide range of activities. Some of the work that falls to HR professionals includes hiring and firing employees, creating organizational charts and shaping corporate culture after a merger or acquisition, managing employee communications, settling employee disputes, creating benefits programs, navigating government regulations, dealing with legal issues such as sexual harassment and occupational safety, and setting up policy and programs for measuring performance, compensating, recognizing, and training employees. In other words, HR doesn't consist of a single activity or function but a huge network of them; basically, HR refers to everything related to the employer-employee relationship.

When searching for HR work, you might consider the following job titles:

Human Resources Generalist – this is a person with background in individual HR specialties who can act as a jack-of-all-trades for the entire company.
Human Resources Manager – A middle management position that may require overseeing specialists responsible for several distinct areas in a division of a company.

Recruiter – Screens, interviews, and recommends prospective employees, and extends offers to successful candidates.

Benefits Analyst – Qualifications can vary greatly depending on the company's needs and the person's experience. At the bottom of the scale, it can be entry level, involving carrying out benefits programs and possibly researching new ones. At the top of the scale, the position may report to a VP and involve strategy and business planning.

Training Manager – Designs, plans, and implements corporate training programs.

Compensation Analyst – Evaluates and conducts surveys and analyzes salary data to come up with the full monetary package offered to employees, including salary, bonuses, and perks, such as stock options.

Labor Relations Manager – Works primarily in manufacturing or service industries and deals with labor unions.

Consider this when interviewing for HR jobs:

A universal plea of HR staffers everywhere is that they are tired of hearing, "I want to work with people." First, the business is about much more than working with people, and second, the hiring manager will want to know how you worked well with people. Be sure to have some specific anecdotes to share with your interviewer that will showcase your interpersonal skills.

"The Lantern" unveiled with new surprises

By Helen Ann Coin
hcoin@ursinus.edu

On Apr. 14, Ursinus College revealed the 79th edition of "The Lantern," the official literary magazine of Ursinus College. Each year, all Ursinus artists, including poets, writers, photographers, and painters, are asked to submit their works in hopes of entering "The Lantern." Fortunately, the turnout was so big this year that the editors, seniors Amber Hyppolite and Nicole Dillie, agreed to make this edition larger than previous years. Instead of issuing two "Lanterns" per school year, they decided to only create one, large edition.

Overall, the 2009-10 "Lantern" consists of 64 pieces of fiction, non-fiction, poems, and visual art. Unlike previous years, this year's "Lantern" is in color. According to Senior Editor Nicole Dillie, "The Lantern is a literary magazine, but we really wanted to tap into the fine arts talent that we know Ursinus has. Having more than one color spot really increased the number of submissions we received." Now, the Ursinus community can truly appreciate the artwork for what it really is – in full color, with all its natural essence. One of the most mesmerizing pieces is the front cover. Titled "Death by Chocolate," Senior Deanna Hayes drew several boxes of chocolate, all of which were drawn with only colored pencils. If it does not sound captivating now, do yourself a favor and grab a copy of "The Lantern," and you will quickly discover its authenticity.

In addition to adding color to this year's magazine, the editors chose to eliminate themselves from "The Lantern," making more room for other artists. Senior editor, Amber Hyppolite, notes, "I am very proud that we made the magazine so much more professional this year, with regard to no editors submitting; still, initially it was hard for me to restrict them at the same time, because our editors are talented writers and artists who deserve to have their voices heard as well."

At the unveiling, five different awards were given to the different artists. This year, both the award for Poetry and The Krueger/Lantern award were given to junior Robert Whitehead for his poem titled, "What Death Became After Cyparissus." Respected poet and author, Constance Merritt, claims, "There is so much to love about this poem; its striking imagery, its intimate colloquy with tradition, its intelligence and its wisdom, and, best of all, the way it so patiently abides in mystery."

Junior Jared Ellis won the Fiction award for his piece "Wet Tongues and Sweaty Cotton." As "The Lantern" states, "The story, moved along by commanding but natural dialogue, dwells not only on the complexities of being different, but also on the weight brought on by silence." The Non-Fiction winner, junior Greta Martikainen-Watcke, received praise for her piece "One Boy in Four Parts." Distinguished author and future Ursinus faculty member, Jennifer Finney Boylan notes that the four smaller pieces "provide a harrowing, but heartwarming portrait of a young woman's arc through romance – and her own soul."

The final award given at the unveiling, called The Doleman Award, is given each year to a Senior that demonstrates an overall outstanding, creative, and influential portfolio. This year's award went to Stephanie Bartusis. Her piece titled, "Getting My Feet Wet," is only one of several amazing pieces Bartusis includes in her portfolio, one that receives praise for its daring and controversial topics.

From topics such as counting and saving loose change to pay for education and alcohol, to tasting morning in a kiss from a lover, to hearing the tragic news that the woman you love is dying, "The Lantern" covers many diverse topics that may appeal to anyone.

Why should you pick up "The Lantern"? Dillie hits the nail on the head when she answers, "Simply put; it's your magazine... There are some very esoteric pieces in here and there are some that are simply fun. UC has a lot of variety to it and we wanted 'The Lantern' to reflect that."

NCAA's first openly gay football captain speaks at UC

By Josh Walsh
jowalsh@ursinus.edu

Last Thursday, The Gay-Straight Alliance (GSA) of Ursinus invited former NCAA Bloomsburg captain Brian Sims to speak on being the only known gay captain in college football. Sims is currently a lawyer in Philadelphia, the Staff Counsel for Policy and Planning at the Philadelphia Bar Association, President of the Board of Directors of EqualityPA, and Chairman of the Board of Directors of GALLOP, among other things.

Describing himself as "professionally gay," Sims began his biography by recounting how he was approached by OutSports, com, a website devoted to gay athletes. It was one of the editors, Cid, who first informed him of the fact that, as far as OutSports could tell, he was the only "out" gay football captain in NCAA history.

Sims' only reaction was: "Oh shit."

Almost immediately after its publication, Sims' article opened a floodgate of E-mails—good, bad, and scary. For the first few days, he got an E-mail about every 5 minutes. For the first three months, he got an E-mail every 15 minutes before he stopped counting. However, it was the scary E-mails, the roughly one-third comprised of teens who were scared to death to come out, that steered Sims toward his role as an advocate for gay rights.

He started compiling support groups and contact information to help these desperate cases. His first "lecture" was for faculty at the University of Pennsylvania, explaining how coaches could be cognizant of LGBT (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgendered) student-athletes' needs. For Sims, the most important factor in the gay rights movement is the Allies: straight white males who actively support gay rights and fight homophobia.

And we have the resources. According to Sims, 80 percent of college students ages 18-22 support the general package of gay rights, but when polled, college students believed that only a third of their demographic supported gay rights. According to Sims, the problem in the gay rights movement is not that people are unsupportive but that people think other people are not.

Sims' stance is clear. It is up to the heterosexual white male majority to promote the gay agenda. "I would rather have one straight ally than five gay activists." The task is all the more important since when heterosexual adult white males hear "Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender," they hear "sex." Not a prodigious start to gay rights reform. Basically, it is up to college students to support gay rights, not to mention racial and economic equality. Luckily, we have the resources. Now, all we have to do is start talking. Loudly.

Going the distance with a nose

By Josh Steinhouse
jsteinhouse@ursinus.edu

When most people hear the name "Patch Adams," an image is conjured up of a delightful movie featuring Robin Williams in his glory days (before the likes of RV and Old Dogs). Few know that the movie was based on a real person, and even less are well-informed on the humanitarian missions that the real Dr. Hunter "Patch" Adams takes in over 69 countries throughout the year.

Over spring break, while many 22-year-olds were either showing off or downing their six-packs, I was nervously boarding a plane to fly 5 hours and 2 time zones to Guatemala to meet a group of 17 unknown volunteers from around the world to spend a week on a Humanitarian Clowning Trip. If you're thinking, "What the hell is that, and why wouldn't you want to party in Cancun instead?" you would be one of many who actually asked me that in person. Put far too simply to do it justice, clowning is using humor at poor areas or hospitals, orphanages, elderly homes, etc. to brighten a person's day. You use your smile and heart and fun to bring all of that out in someone else. As Patch described it on the trip, "you're a Smile Doctor."

For those who have not been to Latin America, or to any area that is poorer than the United States, it is impossible to describe some of the livelihoods that most have there. From metal shacks put together with little more than cheap string and packing tape to the dirt roads that are major arteries, so many simple pleasures that Americans have are just unheard of in these areas. This isn't to make you, the reader, feel guilty or feel as if I'm purposely yanking your heartstrings; rather, it is meant to give context to the sheer hopelessness that I felt as I gave a child who wouldn't live until Christmas a simple balloon animal and watched her face light up brighter than the hottest star.

Being a clown, or Smile Doc-cells to an infected area, and so on.

You don't need to have a medical license to see that laughter and love are powerful remedies to the most awful of diseases. No, it won't cure cancer, or AIDS, or repair lost limbs. And many that go on these trips, like myself, feel a sense of hopelessness or helplessness as we watch a patient who can barely speak try to thank us for making his or her day better. But that sphere of foam on your face is all it takes to bring a smile to a child's (or adult's!) features, and I carry mine wherever I go as not just a chance to make someone new happy, but to help me remember every person that has ever had a moment of joy from my little red nose.

Erin Dickerson: promoting diversity at Ursinus

By Olivia Minick
olminick@ursinus.edu

Ursinus College is an institution that promotes equality and diversity amongst all who walk through its gates. On this campus, there are individuals who strive to unite the students, faculty, and administration to make the college diverse as a whole. While taking advantage of the college's resources to make diversity one of her main priorities, Erin Dickerson is notably recognized for her achievements.

Before graduating from Ursinus in 2003, when CIE was not mandatory, Dickerson noted that "the college was not as diverse in terms of demographics." As President Strassburger also stressed the need for diversity, Dickerson has made it a point--after graduating and becoming the College's Associate Director of Admissions and the coordinator of Multicultural Recruitment--that college should be an opportunity for all. She says to those from low-income families who think that private school is not an option that there is a college out there for everyone, and her goal is to show those possibilities to them. She mentioned that not only is granting access to underrepresented populations imperative but also that once these students matriculate, "the Bridge program is something that must really be pushed because it is a great way to network, feel a connection, and feel at home." As diversity is something that is continuing to change across America, especially with Barack Obama as President, she mentioned that Martin Luther King Jr. taught us to "judge people by their character and not by the color of their skin," but unfortunately, some people still judge by the latter. Her methods to changing that frame of mind have started within our small community, and she knows that a private liberal arts school is the place to make it happen.

When asked about whether she feels that having the historically black fraternity Kappa Alpha Psi back on campus will improve diversification, social life, and community involvement, she replied with certainty that it will, and that it is for everyone. After seeing the first line of Kappa's leave, she believed that there must be something on campus that upholds minority men in order to promote leadership. She knows that any group is "only as strong as their weakest link" and went on to say, "I see their possibilities and push them so they can achieve." She believes that it is about turning "raw talent into something productive" and that overall, this college is one that does that for each individual. While serving as the Varsity Cheerleading coach, running the tour guiding program, organizing college visits, and most recently becoming an administrating member of the Teagle program, Erin Dickerson is also a mentor to multiple students. In order to unite people, one must set goals, and that is what Dickerson sets out to do.

To sum it all up, promoting diversity is a key to success for Erin Dickerson. As the campus goes through many architectural, population, and educational advances, diversity is an advance being made with the help of many caring faculty, administrators, and students. For those who are seeking leadership positions, Dickerson gives a piece of advice: to "get involved, take advantage--these are four years for life. Ursinus is not only an institution, but a lifestyle."

UCDC brings a round of fresh performances tonight through Saturday

By Gianna Paone
gipaone@ursinus.edu

Looking for something different to do this weekend? The Ursinus College Dance Company (UCDC) will be holding their April performance from Thursday, Apr. 22 through Saturday, Apr. 24 at 7:30 p.m. in the Kaleidoscope Lenfest Theater.

Along with a showcasing of student efforts under the direction of Ursinus Dance

Professor Cathy Young, the event will also feature pieces reflecting the work of celebrated jazz dance choreographer Danny Buraczeski, a guest on campus who is currently working with student dancers. His piece, called "Swing Concerto," also features the restaging efforts of Prof. Young as part of the National Endowment for the Arts grant that was extended to Ursinus' Dance Department last spring. An extremely high-energy swing dance piece, the performance is said to be "so much fun to watch that you'll want to be on stage with them!" according to junior Danielle Chmielewski, an Ursinus dancer involved with some of the weekend's performances.

The show's opening act features another guest artist's work: a modern ballet piece with choreography by Melissa Chisena, who currently teaches ballet on campus.

Gracing the audience with an African dance piece, Marilyn and Sekou Sylla will reveal their choreographic contributions in a performance that Chmielewski describes as "high-energy, loud, and exciting--audience cheering encouraged!"

Student and faculty work, of course, is also included. A senior piece, for example, features choreography by Prof. Young as well as the combined movements of seniors Roger Lee and Danielle Harris. Prof. Young will also participate in one of several duets, while the others are choreographed by Ursinus Dance Professor Chris Aiken and will offer an interesting mix of flow and tension.

Undoubtedly, this weekend's performances will be original and exciting! Tickets are $5.00 for general admission and $2.00 for students and senior citizens. Additional information and reservations can be obtained at 610-409-3795.

Discovering the pros and cons of unpaid internships

By Caitlin Dalik
cadalik@ursinus.edu

A recent article in "The New York Times" shed light on a controversial topic: unpaid internships. As I read this article, I found myself becoming angry. I have completed unpaid internships and understand why federal and state regulators have started to worry that unpaid internships are being used illegally by employers for free labor.

Today college students are under pressure to find jobs in this uncertain economy. Since the job market is super competitive, we are told by parents, career counselors, and professors to go out and get internships. It has become almost impossible to be considered for a job without internship experience, and because of this, college students will take unpaid internships solely to gain experience.

The Labor Department explains that for an internship to be unpaid it should be similar to training given at a vocational school or academic institution, it must benefit the intern and not just the company, and should offer college credit. The major problem is that companies hire interns to do their secretarial work and interns may not gain any real experience from the internship. Many unpaid internships involve unskilled work where interns are answering phones and making coffee runs.

Today about one-fourth to one-half of internships are unpaid and the number of unpaid internships has increased more than 300 percent in the last two years. Last year I applied to 40 summer internships; only two offered pay. Of course, the internships that offer pay are generally the most competitive. Since I applied to internships in the communications industry, I was aware that I probably was not going to be able to obtain a paid internship. However, I did not understand the extent to how competitive the internship field is. One of the many rejection E-mails from a company explained that they had over 4,000 applicants for less than 50 intern positions. But that was not all: this was for an unpaid internship. I had a 1 in 80 chance of getting a spot. This blew my mind. As I continued to get rejection E-mails, I noticed how many people were willing to work for experience and no pay.

I ended up taking an unpaid internship because I realized that the experience was really what I needed. Not only did I have to commute 40 minutes to and from my internship but my boss informed me that I would have to pay for my parking pass. With the cost of gas and my parking pass (and just general living expenses), I had no other option but to get another job part-time. Between my internship and part-time job, I was often working 60 hours a week, shuffling from one place to the next. This frustrated me because in order for me to gain experience, this unpaid internship stunted my summer income. For many college students, it is not an option to have an unpaid summer.

With each internship I took, I always expect to gain new skills and be involved with the team I work with. However, I seem to always find myself answering phones, making copies, mailing packages, and doing all of the busy work that my boss does not have time to do. Essentially being an intern means you are at the bottom of the ladder. Unfortunately, this is just where everyone has to start.

I cannot bash unpaid internships because they do often turn out to be great experiences. You can learn a lot about the industry you wish to work in and can gain valuable references. However, unpaid internships put a lot of college students who do not have a lot of money at a disadvantage. For me, I wish I could have interned every summer and winter break. However, it would have been impossible for me to work without pay. So my advice to undergrads is to think about how important internship experience is to your future career and if you can afford to intern without pay. And of course, to look around for paid internships.

Sometimes it's hard to find an internship that strikes your fancy. The following (paid) internship lists were compiled by Vault.com. Check out their website to see if they interest you, too!

Transferring and adapting to life at UC

By Katherine Haldeman
kahaldeman@ursinus.edu

When going into the winter semester of your sophomore year, normally one would feel comfortable and ready to take on the world; however, if you just transferred to a brand new school you would probably be feeling rather uncomfortable.

When I decided in November I was going to transfer, I had major doubts and major anxiety, but I can confidently say Ursinus made it a pretty easy process. Unfortunately, since my transcript was needed from the Fall 2009 semester, it took a while to get my official acceptance, and by a while I mean, I officially was accepted one week before classes started. (Womp! Womp!) This of course looked to me as a warning sign, a sign telling me this was a totally stupid idea. Here I was with a week to find housing, pick classes, pack my apartment from Towson, and readjust to not only an entirely new campus but an entirely different one. Since, Towson University is a large public state school (approx. 20,000 students) right down the street from downtown Baltimore, the change to a small private school with only 2,000 students and pretty far from the city, was and still is a HUGE difference.

When I first looked at Ursinus, I, in a sense, "fell in love" with the campus, it just had this welcoming spirit - one that was totally different from that of the outskirts of Baltimore - and I was ready for the change. My tour was great and extremely informative and I felt that the smaller class size was going to be awesome. Now, I can say I enjoy the small class size but the direct attention with a professor is something I am still trying to adjust too. I'm not just a number here I am actual student with an actual name. And while it is good to not just be a number, it truly is a big change!

Aside from adapting to the differences in class sizes and individualized attention, it is so nice to see a difference in food. While the food here isn't quite something my mother would whip up, it is at least nice to see it labeled. When you're trying to feed 20,000 students and have 4 different dining locations sometimes the food just gets put out, and isn't always labeled, or edible for that matter.

While there were a bunch of pros to my transfer, I found the hardest part of my adjustment to be my parking ticket two weeks into the semester. While I am a very understanding person, and do understand that parking services has to stick to their rules, I found it to be very stressful when I got a ticket for parking in the driveway outside of my house. It was made even more stressful when I had zero understanding from parking services when it came time to try to appeal it. Overall, I have encountered many people who are willing and understanding, and have worked with me during my adjustment; however, parking services was not one of them. Getting a ticket two weeks into being at Ursinus was one of the most stressful aspects of the entire adjustment.

In the past month I have met people and had enough experiences to assure me that my decision to become a UC Bear was the right one. While life has its ups and downs - and so did my first semester here - I can say it is definitely worth the struggles.

An Ursinus student's journey to Istanbul, Turkey

By Thomas Nucatola
 thnucatola@ursinus.edu

Where in the world can you find Roman and Greek ruins, early Christian churches, mosques, world-renowned mosaics and several historic palaces? Turkey. Not only can you find these wonderful tourist sites here, but also a remarkably fascinating culture and history. Istanbul was the center of both the Ottoman and Byzantine Empires, and it bears their cultural and archaeological ruins.

Istanbul was once home to thriving Christian, Jewish and Muslim communities. Now only small Jewish and Christian communities remain; however, the city remains at the center of the Greek-Orthodox community, and several prominent synagogues continue to function. The Muslim community is thriving. The mosques, which remain from Ottoman times, are functioning and well supported. Despite the beautiful architecture and the great sights, the people and the historical context of this society have been, by far, the most fascinating segment of this trip.

One of my first experiences in Turkey was the town of Mustafapasha, formerly Sinasos, (named so since 1923) in Cappadocia. Mustafapasha is a frequent stop for tour buses moving throughout Cappadocia, but not for any of its modern features. The town is a stop because it is both a real life example of modern Turkey and a reminder of Turkey's complicated history.

Mustafapasha was once a predominantly Greek and Christian community, but only an old school, several crumbling churches and formerly Greek houses remained after the population exchange in 1923. The community no longer has any Greek members. Today, the dominant feature of the present community is its mosque, which sits at the center of the town and is a stark contrast to the town's past.

As I toured the town, we viewed homes, which once belonged to the town's Greek residents. Towards the end of our tour, the call to prayer went out across the town. Local men, mostly elderly, came out of their homes and walked slowly to their mosque in order to perform their religious duties. This town, which was once home to a thriving Christian community had, in 87 years, been entirely transformed from largely Greek and Christian to entirely Turkish and Muslim.

The circumstances surrounding Mustafapasha are not unique to in any way. Istanbul remains home to the Ecumenical Patriarchate, but the existing Greek Orthodox community in Istanbul is dwindling; according to a spokesperson from the patriarchate – only between 2000 and 2500 remain connected with the church. Reuters estimates the Greek-Orthodox population of Turkey to be 20,000 out of 70 million. At the start of World War I, Christians made up 20 percent of the population of Turkey, but now they are less than one percent.

Turkey's most peculiar attribute is that it is capable of having multiple identities. The present population is overwhelmingly Muslim, but Turkey's lands are riddled with beautiful churches. The call to prayer echoes across the city, but the Hagia Sophia stands within sight of the Blue Mosque. Topkapı palace, once the administrative center of an empire claiming the authority of the caliphate, stands a short cab ride from the still functioning center of the Greek-Orthodox community. Turkey's Christians have for the most part left, but Turkey remains an eternal home to the legacy of its Christian communities.

For those who wish to observe cultural and demographic changes associated with historical events, Turkey presents a clear and definite example of the repercussions of human actions. After being in Turkey for even a short time, it becomes clear that this society is home to a historical legacy of dramatic change: Roman to Byzantine, Byzantine to Ottoman, Christian to Muslim and finally from heterogeneous to homogeneous.

Summer movie preview: "Salt," "Iron Man," and more

By Carly Siegler
 casiegler@ursinus.edu

was a very funny movie, the ideal combination of hilarity and utter ridiculousness. This is the first movie I have had the chance to see in what seems an eternity, and the unadulterated joy I felt while watching it was somewhat symbolic for me. I have dipped my foot in the waters as I prepare to take the plunge into what promises to be an exhilarating summer at the movies.

As far as comedies, "Date Night" was the best non-foreign import I've seen in awhile. I am still bewildered as to why director Neil LaBute found it necessary to remake the brilliant 2007 British comedy called "Death at a Funeral," being released this week. It scares me to think that Hollywood is so starved for good ideas that they are remaking movies that are only three years old. I am hoping that the Tom Cruise/Cameron Diaz "Knight and Day" (June 25) lives up to its trailer. Like date night, this is both a comedy ("Nobody follow us or I kill myself and then her!") and an action flick. Sure, Tom has aged a few years since his "Mission: Impossible" days, but I think he still has it in him.

Coincidentally, Cruise was also slated to star (July 23) as a CIA-officer accused of being a double agent in "Salt," but when the movie is released you will instead be seeing Ms. Angelina-I-do-all-my-own-stunts-Jolie in the role instead. Liev Schreiber also stars. Speaking of ass-kickery, who's excited for "Iron Man 2," and the return of Robert Downey Jr. as the super suave superhero? With the additions of a post-comeback Mickey Rourke and Scarlett Johansson, and the return of Gwyneth Paltrow as Pepper Potts, here's hoping that this franchise does not experience a sophomore slump in quality, because it's guaranteed to be one of the highest grossing films of the summer regardless.

Speaking of sequels, I was opposed to the first "Sex and the City" movie, because I felt it was a mistake to mess with the perfection that was the series finale of "SATC." I enjoyed the movie, but it felt contrived to me. Clearly Carrie and Mr. Big were not going to stay broken up after all those years spent building up the relationship, then breaking it down, only to build it up again, only the confirming its longevity. Judging by the previews for "Sex and the City 2," I am correct in my belief that money is the leading factor in putting out a sequel, as director Michael Patrick King seems to be fresh out of ideas. Even New York City has lost its luster for Carrie, Samantha, Charlotte, and Miranda, who are on their way to Abu Dhabi. Carrie even runs into old bf Aidan (John Corbett), who never did much for me in the first place. Personally, if there is ever a third "Sex and the City," here's hoping that they bring back Baryshnikov's Aleksandr Petrovsky. Since the creators seem so fond of sending their characters to exotic places in these movies, it would hardly seem an inconvenience to jet the fab foursome off to Russia.

I am pretty sure that I just lost 99% of my male readership with that last paragraph, so I am just going to skim over my excitement for "The Twilight Saga: Eclipse" (June 30), and dive right back into the films that fall undisputedly under the category of ass-kicking goodness, such as "Robin Hood," starring Russell Crowe and pretty much every British actor not in the "Harry Potter" movies. Then there is Christopher Nolan's "Inception," which intrigues me partly because reading synopses and watching trailers have brought me no closer to understanding what this film is about, and also because it features Cillian Murphy (Scarecrow in "Batman Begins"), the Irish gem who puts out a new movie so scarcely that it is almost guaranteed that whatever he does will be utterly brilliant. Oh, and Leo DiCaprio also stars in the film opening July 16.

It is a bittersweet reality that is dawning, that one of the best years of my life is soon to end, and so I find it a useful coping mechanism to think of the future in terms of movies. Truly, I am comforted by the idea that if nothing as exciting as my freshman year of college happens to me over the next few months, then at least I will have some action-packed alternate realities to inhabit this summer.

UC Women's Tennis continues with season

By Helen Ann Coin
hecoin@ursinus.edu

With their season coming to a close, the Ursinus College Women's tennis team continued their excitement and eagerness to take on their opponents with a fresh, new line-up. After finishing in 5th place in the Centennial Conference last season, only one spot away from playoffs, the team realized that they would have to be bigger and better this current season. Yet, after two of their star players graduated last spring, the team wondered how they were going to turn their new, young players into power players.

Senior Christina Lippe, one of the team captains, explained, "We needed the freshman to step up this year. The freshmen are very talented, but they need a little more match experience in this conference because our conference is very tough."

With such young players lacking experience in this particular conference, the team decided to build strengths in other ways.

One way that the team hopes to achieve success on the court is by succeeding in building a strong, friendly, supportive team off the courts.

Senior Christina Lippe, one of the team captains, explained, "When you have a team that loves to be with each other, it makes the season and the sport a million times more fun." To further their team bonding, the women's tennis team trained in Florida for their spring break. Along with having a match or practice each day during the break, the team had bonding activities at night and team dinners. "It is a great time for team bonding because all we do is hang out together and play," Lippe adds.

All of the bonding and support for one another has actually helped the team overcome some heart-breaking failures by turning them into learning experiences. Earlier this season, the team suffered a devastating loss against Haverford. Lippe notes that after the match, "We tried out some new doubles teams and made practices a little more intense. Everyone had a very open mind about it and pushed themselves to become better on the court." Instead of hanging their heads in defeat, the players unified and illustrated trust in one another in order to produce better results in the following match.

Usually, Ursinus loses to Muhlenburg in a shutout. However, Ursinus finished the match with a loss of only 6-3, the best they have done against Muhlenburg in years. "The team pulled themselves together after a tough loss," Lippe comments in reference to Haverford.

While the Ursinus Women's tennis team exhibited few tremendous successes so far, the season is still quite young. The match against Muhlenburg conveys hope and promise for the team to give us a committed and driven season, even if the scoreboard does not reflect desired numbers.

After hearing about this passionate and positive team, one question seems to come to mind: How does one truly measure success? The scores may not be appreciated, but the close relationships and memories formed almost seem worth just as much. As Lippe exclaims, "We are all great friends and we love hanging out with each other. We are constantly laughing and having a great time." For a college who strongly values sportsmanship and team unity, the Ursinus Women's tennis team demonstrates nothing but success.

Softball coaches might begin to look to UC for advice

By Nick Pane
nipane@ursinus.edu

Coach Terry McGowan certainly knows a thing or two about a string of successful seasons. Not only is this season any different from his others, but expectations have even increased this year, if that was even possible.

McGowan, in his tenth season as the Head Softball Coach, is currently in the middle of another impressive run. The softball team sits at 21-3, good for first place in the Centennial Conference by a comfortable margin. The team is led by All-American pitcher and team captain, Lauren Davis-Macedonia, who has been nothing but spectacular since coming to Ursinus.

"I think she's one of the best pitchers, if not the best pitcher in the country," said McGowan. "Because of her, Ursinus has the best team Earned Run Average in Division III, at less than one run allowed per game." Davis-Macedonia, the only senior on the team, has pitched twenty games this season, completing fourteen of them. As if that wasn't impressive enough, many of those games have been shutouts. Combined with freshman pitcher Jennilyn Weber, the Ursinus starting pitching is at a sparling 0.74 ERA. The team has certainly enjoyed the masterful pitching performances, especially with such a young team this year.

While Ursinus lacks experience, with only one senior and three juniors, the youth on the team is prevalent. Twelve freshman and five sophomores complete the roster for the Softball team, something that McGowan is hardly concerned about.

"This is a very unique freshman class. They have a lot of depth and quality in them. There are twelve freshmen on the team, that's hard to do," said McGowan. "All of the coaches in the conference tell me they'll let you down because they're freshmen but they haven't. Other coaches want to develop their players, I don't believe in that. For me if they can play as a freshman, they can play." McGowan certainly holds true to that belief, because six of Ursinus' nine starters happen to be freshmen. With 21 of the 24 games resulting in victories, perhaps the other coaches in the conference should reconsider their own strategies.

Ursinus continues to inch closer towards a playoff berth, and the likely number one over-certainly be an expectation. The pitching is certainly a distinct advantage for Ursinus, but they are no slouches at the plate either.

Four players are hitting over .300 for the Lady Bears, including Kelly Kalovcak, batting .394, and Allison Pfrommer at .370. As a team, Ursinus averages exactly five runs per game, seemingly more than enough run support for their starting pitching. It is a unit that has great chemistry, which is something that McGowan relishes.

"The one thing that I want them to take from this program would be the real meaning of teamwork," said McGowan. "I think the true meaning of teamwork, especially when you have this many freshmen with one senior and three juniors is really important. Sometimes, when you have this many freshmen you can have discrepancy, but they really appreciate and understand the meaning of teamwork and team play. I think that will follow them beyond graduation and throughout their careers."
