

Aberystwyth University

State terror, terrorism research and knowledge politics

Jackson, Richard Dean Wells

Publication date:
2008

Citation for published version (APA):

Jackson, R. D. W. (2008). State terror, terrorism research and knowledge politics.
<http://hdl.handle.net/2160/1949>

General rights

Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the Aberystwyth Research Portal (the Institutional Repository) are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

- Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the Aberystwyth Research Portal for the purpose of private study or research.
- You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
- You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the Aberystwyth Research Portal

Take down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

tel: +44 1970 62 2400
email: is@aber.ac.uk

State terror, terrorism research and knowledge politics¹

Richard Jackson

Aberystwyth University, Wales, UK

Employing a discourse analytic approach, this paper examines the silence on state terrorism within the broader terrorism studies literature. An analysis of this literature reveals that state terrorism is noticeable mainly for its absence as a subject of systematic academic study. Following the textual analysis, the main finding – the silence on state terrorism within terrorism studies – is subjected to both a first and second order critique. A first order or immanent critique uses a discourse's internal contradictions, mistakes and misconceptions to criticise it on its own terms. In this case, the absence of state terrorism is criticized for its illogical actor-based definition of terrorism, its politically biased research focus, and its failure to acknowledge the empirical evidence of the extent and nature of state terrorism. A second order critique entails reflecting on the broader political and ethical consequences of the representations enabled by the discourse. It is argued that the absence of state terrorism from academic discourse functions to promote particular kinds of state hegemonic projects, construct a legitimizing public discourse for foreign and domestic policy, and deflect attention from the terroristic practices of states. The exposure and destabilisation of this dominant narrative also opens up critical space for the articulation of alternative and potentially emancipatory forms of knowledge and practice.

Introduction

Terrorism studies, once a fairly minor sub-field of security studies, has rapidly expanded to become a stand-alone field with its own dedicated journals, research centres, leading scholars and experts, canon of published works, research funding opportunities, conferences, seminars, and study programmes. A perennial criticism of the field's voluminous output however, has been the neglect of 'state terrorism' as a subject for systematic and sustained research,² a problem noted during the Cold War but which seems to have become even more acute since September, 2001 (see Blakeley 2007, Zulaika and Douglass 1996, George 1991; Herman and O'Sullivan 1989, Herman 1982). To many observers this neglect is somewhat puzzling given that the genealogy of the term 'terrorism' has its earliest roots in the deployment of violence by states to terrify and intimidate civilian populations, states have employed terrorism far more extensively than non-state actors over the past two centuries, state terrorism is far more lethal and destructive than non-state terrorism, and the employment of terror against civilians by states continues unabated in a great many countries today.

The purpose of this paper is to explore this puzzle broadly through the prism of discourse analysis, a form of critical theorising aimed in part at understanding and describing the relationship between knowledge, power, and politics. Taking as its starting point that

¹ Another version of this paper has recently been published as: Richard Jackson, 2008. 'The ghosts of state terror: knowledge, politics and terrorism studies', Critical Studies on Terrorism, 1(3): 377-392 [copyright Taylor & Francis, available online at: <http://www.informaworld.com/smpp/title~content=g906444577~db=all>].

² This is not to say that state violence and repression has not been studied, but rather that it has not been systematically studied under the rubric of 'terrorism' or by recognised terrorism studies scholars.

knowledge and its production is never a purely neutral exercise but always works for someone and for something, this paper seeks to excavate the ideological effects of the discourse on state terrorism (or, more accurately, the silence within the discourse) in the terrorism studies field. It argues that the way in which state terrorism is constructed as a (non)subject both distorts the field as an area of scholarly research, and more importantly, reifies dominant structures of power and enables particular kinds of elite and state hegemonic projects.

Analysing the discourse of state terrorism

The analytical approach employed in this study falls under the mantle of discourse analysis (see Miliken 1999, Laffey and Weldes 1997, Purvis and Hunt 1993, Yee 1996), as employed within a broadly social constructivist framework. A form of critical theorising, discourse analysis aims primarily to illustrate and describe the relationship between textual and social and political processes. In particular, it is concerned with the politics of representation – the manifest political or ideological consequences of adopting one mode of representation over another. In this case, I am concerned with the ways in which state terrorism is represented – or not represented, which is itself a kind of representation – as a subject within the field of terrorism studies. Discourse theorising is predicated on a number of theoretical commitments, including, among others: an understanding of language as constitutive or productive of meaning; an understanding of discourse as structures of signification which help to construct social realities, particularly in terms of defining subjects and establishing their relational positions within a system of signification (see for example, Doty 1993); an understanding of discourse as being productive of subjects authorised to speak and act, legitimate forms of knowledge and political practices, and importantly, common sense within particular social groups and historical settings; an understanding of discourse as necessarily exclusionary and silencing of other modes of representation; and an understanding of discourse as historically and culturally contingent, inter-textual, open-ended, requiring continuous articulation and re-articulation and therefore, open to destabilisation and counter-hegemonic struggle (Milliken 1999).

On this epistemological foundation, the discourse analytic technique employed in this paper proceeded in two main stages. The first stage entailed a close examination of a large number of texts from within the terrorism studies field.³ As such, the primary units of analysis or ‘data’ for this research were more than 100 mainstream academic books, articles in the main terrorism studies and international relations journals, conference papers presented at the ISA and APSA conventions, and reports and websites from think-tanks and research institutions. Each text was examined initially to see if it contained the terms ‘state terrorism’ or ‘state terror’. Texts that did contain these terms were then examined to see how they were constructed as a discursive formation and subject of knowledge, how they were deployed within broader narratives, and how state terrorism was positioned as a subject in relation to non-state terrorism. Employing a ‘grounded theory’ approach, the analysis was considered complete when the addition of new texts did not yield any new insights or categories.

The second stage of the research involved subjecting the findings of the textual analysis to both a first and second order critique. A first order or immanent critique uses a discourse’s internal contradictions, mistakes, misconceptions, and omissions to criticise it on its own terms and expose the events and perspectives that the discourse fails to acknowledge or address. The point of this form of internal critique is not necessarily to establish the 'correct' or 'real truth' of the subject beyond doubt, but rather to destabilise dominant interpretations and demonstrate the inherently contested and political nature of the discourse.

³ A great deal of my previous research has involved a discourse analysis of texts from the terrorism studies field. For this paper, I re-examined many of these texts, as well as a number of new texts. Previous discourse analytic studies which broadly support the findings in this paper include, among others: Jackson 2007a, 2007b, 2007c, 2005.

A second order critique entails reflecting on the broader political and ethical consequences – the ideological effects – of the representations and more importantly in this case, the silences, enabled by the discourse. Specifically, it involves an exploration of the ways in which the discourse functions as a 'symbolic technology' (Laffey and Weldes 1997) that can be wielded by particular elites and institutions, to: structure the primary subject positions, accepted knowledge, commonsense and legitimate policy responses to the actors and events being described; exclude and de-legitimise alternative knowledge and practice; naturalise a particular political and social order; and construct and sustain a hegemonic regime of truth. A range of specific discourse analytic techniques are useful in second order critique: genealogical analysis, predicate analysis, narrative analysis, and deconstructive analysis (see Milliken 1999, p. 306).

It is crucial to recognise that discourses are significant not just for what they say but also for what they do not say; the silences in a discourse can be as important, or even more important at times, than what is stated. This is because silence can function ideologically in any number of ways. For example, silence can be a deliberate means of distraction or misdirection from uncomfortable subjects or contrasting viewpoints, the suppression or de-legitimisation of alternative forms of knowledge or values, the tacit endorsement of particular kinds of practices, setting the boundaries of legitimate knowledge, or as a kind of disciplining process directed against certain actors – among others. In other words, the silences within a text often function as an exercise in power; revealing and interrogating those silences therefore, is an important part of first and second order critique.

Lastly, it is important to note that when we examine a discourse as a broad form of knowledge and practice, it is never completely uniform, coherent, or consistent; it always has porous borders and often contains multiple exceptions, inconsistencies, and contradictions by different speakers and texts. Many of the terrorism scholars discussed in this paper for example, upon a close reading of their individual texts, often express more nuanced arguments than are necessarily presented here. The important point is not that each text or scholar can be characterised in the same uniform way, or even that these scholars agree on a broad set of knowledge claims. It is rather, that taken together as an overall social discourse and a body of work that has political and cultural currency, the narratives and forms of the discourse function to construct and maintain a specific understanding of, and approach to, 'terrorism' and 'state terrorism' and that this knowledge has certain political and social effects.

The ghosts of state terror in terrorism studies

I refer to the 'ghosts' of state terrorism because even though the main finding of my discourse analysis is that state terrorism is largely missing as a subject from the broader terrorism literature, its ghostly outline can still be detected in a variety of forms. For example, it is something of a cliché to note that the term 'terror' from which 'terrorism' derives was first used to describe revolutionary counter-violence by the French state, was employed by the Nuremberg prosecutors to condemn Nazi actions and forms of rule in Europe, and was used by historians to describe Soviet governance during the reign of Joseph Stalin. It has also been noted that the term shares the same Latin root as the term 'territory' and that the fear (terror) of state violence has a central place in the emergence and dominance of the modern state and Western political theory (see Hindess 2006, Robin 2004). The term therefore contains within itself the discursive echoes of state violence, despite its more recently constructed meaning as a descriptor for non-state actions and behaviour.

In addition to this genealogical trace, a discourse analysis of the field reveals that there are a great many prominent scholars who acknowledge in passing that terrorism is a strategy of political violence which any actor can employ, including states, but then do not examine cases of state terrorism in any systematic or sustained manner in their own research. Walter Laqueur, arguably one of the founders of terrorism studies, is emblematic of this practice: he openly accepts that states have killed many more people and caused far more material and social destruction than ‘terrorism from below’, but then argues that this is simply not the terrorism he wishes to examine (Laqueur 1997, p. 6). Similarly, Paul Wilkinson, perhaps the most well-known scholar in the field notes: ‘if we are to gain an adequate understanding of the broader historical and international trends we need to recognize throughout history it is regimes and states, with their overwhelming propensity of coercive power, which have shown the greatest propensity for terror on a mass scale, both as an instrument of internal repression and control, and as a weapon of aggression and subjugation’ (Wilkinson 2001, p. 41). However, like Laqueur, Brian Jenkins, and the vast majority of terrorism studies scholars, Wilkinson has not, to date, studied state terrorism systematically, but instead focused the vast majority of his work on non-state forms of terrorism. As Sam Raphael has recently demonstrated, this same approach characterises a significant proportion of the most widely cited and well-known terrorism scholars – the recognised ‘terrorism experts’ (Raphael 2007).

This is not to say that state terrorism is not studied at all in the broader literature; there is a relatively small but important body of research on the subject (see for example, Stohl 2006, Becker 2006, Blakeley 2006, Grosscup 2006, Gareau 2004, Sluka 2000a, George 1991, Stohl and Lopez 1986, 1984, Herman 1982) – as well as large related literatures on repression, genocide, torture, and the like. However, the state terrorism literature is numerically tiny compared to the many thousands of publications on non-state terrorism. More importantly, analyses of author affiliation and the political-scholarly epistemic networks they work within (see Reid 1997) demonstrates that the vast majority of state terrorism scholars come from disciplines outside of international relations and political science, such as anthropology, sociology, and criminology. Furthermore, most are not recognised as ‘terrorism experts’ by the media or political establishment (few are asked to appear in the media or provide expert testimony to political bodies, for example), few publish in the recognised terrorism studies journals, and their work is rarely cited in the mainstream terrorism studies literature. In other words, these scholars and this literature exist largely on the periphery of the terrorism studies field.

Related to this very small and often invisible section of the broader discourse, there are a similarly small number of texts in which state terrorism is given a reasonably systematic treatment within the context of a broader treatment of terrorism. For example, there are a number of introductory texts in which state terrorism is analysed within a stand-alone chapter or section (see for example, Goodin, 2006, Martin 2003, Barker 2002, Townshend 2002). However, the important point to note about these texts is that they are mainly introductory in nature, they are based on a description of secondary materials rather than the presentation of any original research, many of them are written by scholars outside of the orthodox terrorism studies field, and the discussion of state terrorism is most often restricted to a single chapter in an entire book. In addition, the subject matter of these introductory chapters is frequently restricted to topics such as the original terror of the French revolutionary state, state sponsorship of non-state terrorist groups, genocide, and case studies of Nazi, Soviet, and Latin American state terror (see for example, Martin 2003). Importantly, a discourse analysis of these texts reveals that there are other forms of silence within them, in particular, a deep and pervasive silence on Western democratic state terrorism, Israeli state terrorism, and post-Cold War state terrorism. It is also important to note that a great many more such introductory texts do not give any systematic attention to state terrorism at all (see Sloan 2006).

There is one more ghostly outline of state terrorism within the broader field, namely, a small but growing literature on so-called ‘state sponsored terrorism’. I have analysed aspects of this literature in more detail elsewhere (Jackson 2007b). Within these texts, one of the most common narratives is that terrorist groups depend upon significant state support to survive and active ‘sponsors’ provide a range of positive and permissive forms of assistance. Gus Martin’s popular textbook for example, suggests that the state sponsorship of terrorism frequently consists of: ‘ideological support’, ‘financial support’, ‘military support’, ‘operational support’, ‘initiating terrorist attacks’, or ‘direct involvement in terrorist attacks’ (Martin 2003, p. 91). Additionally, it is commonly argued that weak, totalitarian, or so-called ‘rogue states’ are predisposed to sponsoring terrorism because:

[F]or aggressive regimes, state terrorism in the international domain is advantageous in several respects: State terrorism is inexpensive... Even poor nations can strike at and injure a prosperous adversary... State terrorism has limited consequences. State assisters that are clever can distance themselves from culpability for a terrorist incident... and thereby escape possible reprisals or other penalties. State terrorism can be successful. Weaker states can raise the stakes beyond what a stronger adversary is willing to bear... [and] successfully destabilize an adversary through the use of a proxy movement. (Martin 2003, pp. 90-91; original emphasis).

In fact, much of the ‘state sponsorship’ literature is devoted to analysing and describing those states viewed as the main sponsors of terrorism, the groups they support, and the kinds of assistance they provide. The state sponsors identified in the literature more often than not coincide with the U.S. State Department’s annual list of ‘state sponsors of international terrorism,’ which typically includes countries with which the U.S. has previously had serious conflicts, such as Iran, Syria, Cuba, North Korea, Sudan, Libya, and Iraq.⁴

One of the most important aspects of this discourse is the way in which the key narratives still focus on non-state groups and actions as primary and states as secondary sponsors and supporters. In other words, there is an implicit sense that states do not commit terrorism directly, but they may support non-state groups that do. Certainly, there is little acknowledgement that state actions such as the use of strategic bombing, particular forms of governance, repression, and counter-terrorism, or the practice of torture for example, can sometimes constitute acts of terrorism. Moreover, within this literature there is another important silence, namely, the silence on Western democratic sponsorship of non-state terrorism: out of dozens of mainstream books and papers which discussed the state sponsorship of terrorism, I found only one or two acknowledgements of U.S. sponsorship of anti-Castro or Contra terrorism, British sponsorship of loyalist terrorism in Northern Ireland,

⁴ Another more recent narrative within this literature is that ‘passive state sponsorship’ provides support for terrorists – that inaction is just as significant as action. Daniel Byman for example, argues that ‘At times, the greatest contribution a state can make to a terrorist’s cause is by not policing a border, turning a blind eye to fundraising, or even tolerating terrorist efforts to build their organizations, conduct operations, and survive’ (Byman 2005, p. III).

Italian sponsorship of right-wing terrorism, Israeli sponsorship of Christian militia terrorism in Lebanon, and other such documented cases.

Beyond these ghostly traces of state terror however, a discourse analysis of the field reveals that the most notable aspect of the state terrorism discourse is its near complete absence; there is almost a total silence on the subject within most books, articles, papers, and writings in the terrorism studies field today. In the vast majority of the more than 100 texts I examined, the terms ‘state terrorism’ or ‘state terror’ did not even appear, much less form the basis for any kind of sustained analyses or discussion. This basic finding, that there is a profound silence on state terrorism within the field, is supported by a broader set of findings. Andrew Silke for example, found that only 12 or less than two percent of articles from 1990 to 1999 in the core terrorism studies journals focused on state terrorism (Silke 2004, p. 206), a finding that echoes Schmid and Jongman’s authoritative survey of the field which concluded that ‘There is a conspicuous absence of literature that addresses itself to the much more serious problem of state terrorism’ (Schmid and Jongman 1988, pp. 179-80). Similarly, it has been noted that only 12 of the 768 pages in the Encyclopaedia of World Terrorism (1997) examined state terrorism in any form (quoted in Goodin, 2006, p. 55). Along the same lines, an analysis of John Thakrah’s popular Dictionary of Terrorism demonstrates that reference to, and discussion of, state terrorism makes up less than 8 out of 308 pages (Thakrah 2004). Extraordinarily, Thakrah’s entry on ‘History of Terrorism’ does not mention a single example of state terrorism (Ibid, pp. 114-120). My own examination of conference paper titles and abstracts found that of 113 papers related to terrorism presented at the 2007 ISA annual convention, only one focused on any aspect of state terrorism; and of 95 papers on terrorism at the 2007 APSA annual convention, only 4 focused on aspects of state terrorism. We might also note that the wider terrorism studies field does not include statistics on state terrorism in any of its recognised data bases, most notably the highly influential RAND database (see Burnett and Whyte 2005, RAND 2006).

In addition to this silence on the broader subject of state terrorism, we can detect a series of other silences. In particular, there is within the terrorism literature virtually no mention or analysis of Western state terrorism, the terror of strategic bombing, the terror of democratic state torture, Western sponsorship of mostly right-wing terrorist groups, Israeli state terrorism, and the terrorism of Western allies during the Cold War and the war on terror – among others. In much contemporary terrorism studies publications, there is an ongoing silence on the terrorism of state-sponsored death squads in Iraq, the terrorism of Western-backed warlords in Afghanistan, and the state terror of Western allies such as Uzbekistan, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Egypt, and the like.

In large part, the silence on state terrorism in the discourse is due to the frequent practice by terrorism scholars of defining terrorism exclusively as a form of non-state violence, thereby excluding states a priori from being able to employ terrorism at all. Bruce Hoffman, for example, argues that terrorism involves violence ‘perpetrated by a subnational group or non-state entity’ (Hoffman 1998, p. 43). This is in keeping with the U.S. State Department’s highly influential definition of terrorism, a definition employed by a significant proportion of terrorism scholars today, which conceives of terrorism as ‘premeditated, politically motivated violence perpetuated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents, usually intended to influence an audience’ (quoted in Martin 2003, p. 33). For the many scholars who adopt this definition, terrorism is both largely indistinguishable from insurgency, militancy, guerrilla warfare, and the like, and more importantly, states are a priori and by definition excluded as actors who can practice terrorism. For these scholars, state violence that is intended to cause terror and intimidate may be described as repression, oppression, human rights abuses, war crimes and the like, but never as ‘terrorism’.

A related strategy has been to try and exclude state terrorism from research by arguing that even if state terrorism does exist, state ‘terror’ is qualitatively different from (non-state) ‘terrorism’ because it has different aims, different means, and it is employed by an actor which has the legitimate right to use violence and who is bound by established rules and norms relating to the use of such violence. Bruce Hoffman for example, makes the terrorism distinction, arguing that there ‘is a fundamental qualitative difference between the two types of violence’ (Hoffman 1998, p. 34). This approach characterises a number of key terrorism scholars, including the paradoxical figure of Walter Laqueur, whose work subsequently treats state terrorism as largely irrelevant to the study of terrorism as a phenomenon.

In sum, a discourse analysis of the terrorism studies field demonstrates that as a subject of discussion and analysis, state terrorism appears most often as a powerful and notable silence, but also at times as a ghostly, indistinct outline. Within that broader silence, moreover, there are other silences too, most notably on cases of Western involvement in and practices of terrorism.

Critical reflections on the ghosts of state terror

The relative silence on state terrorism within the broader terrorism studies discourse is susceptible to both a first and second order critique. A first order critique reveals that the discourse is predicated on a number of highly problematic and contestable set of assumptions and knowledge practices, while a second order critique exposes the ways in which the discourse functions politically to naturalise and legitimise particular forms of knowledge and political practices.

First order critique

Employing the same social scientific modes of analysis, terminology, and empirical categories used by terrorism studies scholars, there are a number of key criticisms to be made against the silence on state terrorism within the broader terrorism studies discourse. In the first place, the actor-based definition of terrorism which excludes states from employing terrorism is not only intellectually untenable, it is absurd. Given that terrorism is a violent tactic in the same way that ambushes are a tactic, it makes no sense to argue that certain actors are precluded by their identity from employing the tactic of terrorism (or ambushes). A bomb planted in a public place where civilians are likely to be randomly killed and that is aimed at causing widespread terror in an audience for a political reason is an act of terrorism regardless of whether it is planted by non-state actors or state agents.

However, it is not the many obvious cases of civilian-directed bombings, kidnappings, or assassinations by state agents which are most hotly disputed, although it is still puzzling how little studied such events are in the literature, and how they are considered to be examples of ‘repression’ by many scholars and not ‘terrorism’ despite their identical characteristics to non-state acts of terror.⁵ Rather, the question is whether or not certain broader state actions and modes of governance can or should be called ‘terrorism’. I would argue that if terrorism refers to violence directed towards or threatened against civilians which is designed to instil terror or intimidate a population for political reasons – a broadly consensual definition of terrorism in the literature (see Raphael 2007) – then states can clearly be terrorists too. For example, when government agents attempt to cause fear and intimidation to sectors of their own population in order to undermine support for an opposition movement through a violent campaign that involves random murder, kidnapping and torture, assassination, and bombs planted in public places (the very same acts that non-state terrorists commit), there is no doubt that in analytical terms, this constitutes terrorism. It is similarly terrorism if they attempt to intimidate the population of another state through the same means.

⁵ There are numerous examples of state agents being directly involved in bombings, assassinations, kidnappings, and the like. Obvious cases include the bomb placed on a Korean Airlines flight from Baghdad to Seoul in 1987 by two North Korean agents that killed all 115 persons on board, and the Lockerbie bombing in 1988 by Libyan agents (see Hoffman 1998, p. 190). In other cases, state agents have planted bombs in so-called ‘black flag operations’ which aim to implicate non-state groups as the perpetrators.

More importantly, employing this understanding of terrorism – as the threat or use of violence against one group of people in order to terrify or intimidate another group of people as a means of preventing or changing their political behaviour – it becomes clear that a number of other state actions can also qualify as ‘terrorism’. For example, when torture is widely employed by the state not simply as a means to secure intelligence about imminent threats, but also as a means of undermining the morale of the leaders and supporters of oppositional groups by spreading widespread fear, then torture clearly becomes a tool of state terrorism. It is important to note that even when states try to hide their involvement in civilian-directed violence such as torture from external audiences, they are still sending a powerful message to the local society or social groups they wish to intimidate. In the use of torture, this is achieved in part by transforming damaged victims into a symbolic message for the target group (Cohen and Corrado 2005, p. 107) – a case of instrumentalising individuals for the purposes of intimidating an audience. The use of disappearances as a strategy of terrorism similarly sends a symbolic message that the state is omnipotent, omnipresent, and utterly ruthless in dealing with its opponents. Crucially, it is important to note that state terrorism may have both instrumental (terroristic) and strategic intentions: killing a popular and effective union organiser for example, both weakens the union in the immediate term and sends a message to future union leaders and the social groups they come from.

Other state practices which fall under the definition of terrorism include the ‘terror bombing’ of civilian areas during wartime to intimidate the population into submission or terrify them into putting pressure on their leaders, particularly when the city is chosen randomly (as a result of favourable weather conditions on the day, for example) and the bombing itself brings no discernible strategic advantage. Under this understanding, certain doctrines of strategic bombing, such as ‘shock and awe’, as well as certain contemporary practices such as the widespread targeting of civilian areas in Israel’s 2006 bombing of South Lebanon and NATO’s bombing of civilian targets during the 1999 Kosovo campaign, clearly fall within the definition of terrorism.⁶ These are all cases of frightening one group of people in order to produce a political change in another, which is the essence of the terrorism tactic. State counter-terrorism and counter-insurgency can also become terrorism when it fails to distinguish between the innocent and the guilty, it is highly disproportionate, and it aims to terrify or intimidate the wider population or a particular community into submission (Goodin 2006, pp. 69-73). Lastly, it can be argued quite persuasively that state doctrines and practices of ‘nuclear deterrence’, ‘coercive diplomacy’ (see Stohl 1988, George 1971), ‘constructive engagement',⁷ sanctions,⁸ and certain peace settlements involving making pacts with groups who have engaged in the widespread use of terror,⁹ can also constitute state terrorism.

⁶ Beau Grosscup (2006) provides a convincing and eloquent argument about why the doctrine and practice of strategic bombing is a form of state terrorism – not least because its original formulation was as ‘terror bombing’ aimed at civilians and intended ‘to create such terror, destruction and misery as to undermine civilians’ morale and in swift order break their fragile will to resist’ (p. 24).

The counter-argument by many terrorism scholars is that the state's use of terror may have some similarities to non-state terrorism but is fundamentally different because states have different aims and methods. This is an unconvincing argument, however. In the first place, terrorism has always been used to pursue a variety of aims, both revolutionary and conservative. State terrorism may be aimed at engendering a political and social revolution, such as the terror employed by the Pol Pot, Stalinist, and Nazi regimes; alternately, it may be aimed at preserving the power of the regime and ensuring a continuation of the status quo, such as the terror of many Latin American dictatorships during the cold war. In most cases, state terrorism is aimed at terrorising the population in the short-term in order to ensure continued political control in the long-term. States often employ terrorism when they lack the normative political means of ensuring control (Gibbs 1989, pp. 338-39). In the same way, non-state terrorist groups also pursue revolutionary or conservative aims. Second, states may have access to more destructive means of violence, but this does not mean that the violence is qualitatively different; it is still directed at civilians and employed symbolically to influence an audience. In any case, the empirical record demonstrates that state terrorism most often employs exactly the same methods – bombings, assassinations, kidnap, torture, and the like – as non-state terrorist groups, even if they can be used more widely and frequently by state actors.

A second important criticism that can be levelled at the field for upholding its silences on state terrorism is that by any empirical measure, states have engaged in far more terrorism than non-state terrorists and their terrorism has been far more serious and destructive. This is not surprising, as states possess far more destructive power than non-state actors and the use of terrorism can become institutionalised in permanent state structures. In addition, there is a great deal of evidence of Western state involvement in terrorism. As a very crude comparison, non-state terrorism is responsible for between a few hundred and a few thousand deaths annually over the entire world, depending upon which data set or measures are employed. By contrast, states have killed, tortured, and intimidated hundreds of millions of people over the past century or so (see Rummel 1994, Sluka 200b), and a great many states continue to do so today in places like Colombia, Haiti, Algeria, Zimbabwe, Myanmar, Uzbekistan, Kashmir, Palestine, Chechnya, Tibet, North Korea, Indonesia, the Philippines, Sudan, and elsewhere. Many of these states regularly employ extensive state torture, extra-judicial killings, disappearances, collective punishments, and daily forms of violent intimidation to terrorise opponents and enforce compliance to state rule; human rights groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch provide meticulous and continual documentation of these violations. The point is that even if only a small fraction of these murders and acts of civilian-directed violence can be identified analytically as acts of state terrorism, they would still vastly outnumber the annual acts of non-state terrorism.

⁷ This doctrine guided U.S. policy towards South Africa at a time when it directly sponsored and supported massive civilian-directed pro-insurgency terror by Renamo in Mozambique and Unita in Angola. It can be argued that South Africa could not have continued to prop up Renamo terror with impunity for more than a decade without U.S. support (Mamdani 2004, pp. 87-95).

⁸ It can be argued that the imposition of sanctions, particularly when the effects of such sanctions result in extensive civilian deaths and appear to be directed at intimidating the entire society (as occurred in Iraq after 1991 where as many as half a million excess deaths were recorded), constitutes a form of terror.

⁹ Mamdani makes the pertinent point that in places like Sierra Leone, Rwanda, Angola, Mozambique, and Congo, governments were compelled to reconcile with terrorist movements who had engaged in massive civilian-directed terror. In this sense, reconciliation became a codeword for impunity and the lack of justice functioned to sustain an international atmosphere of tolerance towards terror (Mamdani 2004, pp. 250-51).

Similarly, Western involvement in terrorism has a long but generally ignored history, which includes: the extensive use of official terror by Britain, France, Germany, Portugal, the U.S. and other colonial powers as a form of governance and social control in numerous countries throughout the colonial period;¹⁰ the ‘terror bombings’ of civilians during World War II and other campaigns; U.S. and Western support and sanctuary for a range of right-wing insurgent groups during the cold war such as anti-Castro groups, the Contras, Unita, the Mujahideen, and others – groups which regularly committed terrorist acts including planting car bombs in markets, kidnappings, assassinations, civilian massacres, and blowing up civilian airliners;¹¹ Israel’s extensive use of state terrorism in the form of torture, extra-judicial assassination, and collective punishments against Palestinian populations in surrounding countries and within the occupied territories; Israeli sponsorship of Christian militia groups in Lebanon who engaged in numerous acts of terror during the 1980s, including the notorious Sabra and Shatilla refugee camp massacres; U.S. tolerance of Irish Republican terrorist activity in the U.S. (see Byman 2005, pp. 21-27); U.S. and Western support for systematic state terror by numerous right-wing regimes across the world, perhaps most notoriously El Salvador, Chile, Guatemala, Indonesia, and Iran – often under the cover of ‘counter-terrorism’ programmes (see Harman 1982, Herman and O’Sullivan 1989, Gareau 2004); U.S. use of terrorism during counter-insurgency operations such as ‘Operation Phoenix’ in Vietnam, and in counter-revolutionary campaigns in Latin America such as ‘Operation Condor’ (see McSherry 2002); British support for Loyalist terrorism in Northern Ireland (see Sluka 2000c) and various other ‘Islamist’ groups in Libya and Bosnia, among others;¹² Spanish state terror during the so-called ‘dirty war’ against ETA (see Aretxaga 2000); French terror in Algeria and against Greenpeace in the Rainbow Warrior bombing; Italian state sponsorship of right-wing terrorists who carried out so-called ‘black flag operations’, such as terrorist bombings, designed to implicate left-wing groups from the late 1960s to the early 1980s; Western support for Afghan (see Gareau 2004, pp. 199-200) and Somali warlords today; the provision of continuing sanctuary to anti-Castro terrorists (see Barker 2002, p. 75, Sanchez 2004), former Latin American state terrorists (Grann 2001), and various Asian anti-communist terrorist groups¹³ in the U.S. today; toleration and support for Pakistan, despite its continued sponsorship of Kashmiri terrorist groups (Dell 2002, p. 37); continuing U.S. and Western support for Colombian state terrorism (see Stokes 2004); the

¹⁰ Evidence of the use of terror by the colonial authorities is contained in an extremely large literature on the history and nature of colonialism, as well as the large post-colonialism literature. More immediately accessible summaries of colonial terror can be found elsewhere (see Barker 2002, pp. 61-86; Herman and O’Sullivan 1989, pp. 3-7).

¹¹ U.S. officials admitted as early as 1983 that the Contras were engaged in the killing of civilians, kidnapping, torture, and indiscriminate attacks. It later emerged that a CIA Contra training manual, Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare, advocated exactly these kinds of civilian-directed proinsurgency tactics. Similar forms of training were provided through proxies to the Afghan insurgents. Similarly, Michael Stohl (1988) quotes CIA data that shows that Cuban exile groups engaged in 89 separate terrorist incidents from 1969-79 alone (p. 189; see also Mamdani 2004, pp. 102, 116; Herman 1982, p. 63).

¹² For example, evidence from former British and French intelligence officers suggests that MI6 paid large sums of money to the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group, a terrorist group associated with al Qaeda, to assassinate Colonel Gadafy in 1996. It is alleged that British intelligence provided sanctuary to members of the group in Britain and subsequently thwarted attempts by Libya to bring Osama bin Laden to justice (‘MI6 “halted” Bin Laden Arrest’, Guardian Weekly, November 14-20, 2002). There is also evidence that British and American intelligence agencies provided a green light to various ‘Islamist’ groups training insurgents to fight in Bosnia (see Meacher 2005).

¹³ After 11 September 2001, the U.S. continued to harbour groups such as Government of Free Vietnam (GFVN), the Cambodian Freedom Fighters (CFF) and other Vietnamese and Laotian dissident groups who had been involved in a number of terrorist attacks over the past few years (Kurlantzick 2002).

extensive use of, and sponsorship of, torture and extraordinary rendition (Grey 2006) in the war on terror today; the toleration (or passive sponsorship) of death squad activity in occupied Iraq today (see Drefus 2005, Hersh 2005); among many other examples.

The most important point to note about this extensive list of examples is that even if we were to restrict our understanding of terrorism to the actions typically employed by non-state actors and we did not include broader forms of governance or state practices during war, we would still have to conclude that states engage in a tremendous amount of terrorism, most of which is never subject to systematic evaluation in the broader terrorism studies literature. Similarly, even by Western democratic measures and understandings of ‘state sponsorship of terrorism’, it is clear that Western sponsorship of terrorism is as long-running and extensive as many of the cases described in the U.S. State Department’s annual list of offending nations. In short, using the very same social scientific modes of analysis, terminology, and empirical categories that are employed by terrorism studies scholars reveals that states, including Western democratic states, employ terrorism too. The puzzle therefore is why are such obvious cases of terrorism so rarely studied by terrorism scholars?

The purpose of a first order critique is not necessarily to establish the full and final truth about terrorism and the role of states in it. Rather, first order critique aims to destabilise dominant understandings and accepted knowledge, expose the biases and imbalances in the field, and suggest that other ways of understanding, conceptualising, and studying the subject – other ways of knowing – are possible. In this case, I have attempted to destabilise dominant understandings of terrorism as solely an activity of non-state actors and reveal how states, including Western democratic states currently involved in fighting a ‘war on terrorism’, regularly employ the tactic of terrorism themselves. This critique destabilises the dominant knowledge and practice of terrorism scholars who primarily focus on examples of non-state terrorism as an object of study or limit their analysis of state sponsors of terrorism to non-Western states. This kind of critical destabilisation is crucial for opening up the space needed to ask new kinds of questions and seek new forms of knowledge.

Second order critique

In contrast to first order critique, second order critique involves the adoption of a critical standpoint outside of the discourse. In this case, based on an understanding of discourse as socially productive or constitutive, and fully cognisant of the knowledge-power nexus, a second order critique attempts to expose the political functions and ideological consequences of the particular forms of representation enunciated by the discourse. In this case, we want to try and understand what some of the political effects and consequences of the silences of state terrorism are. A number of such effects can be identified.

First, the discourse naturalises a particular understanding of what terrorism is, namely, a form of illegitimate non-state violence. Such an understanding of terrorism functions to restrict the scholarly viewpoint to one set of actors and to particular kinds of actions, and functions to distract and obscure other actors and actions which should be named and studied as ‘terrorism’. It also narrows the possibilities for understanding terrorism within alternative paradigms, such as from the perspective of gender terrorism (see Sharlach 2008). In other words, it has a restrictive and distorting effect within the field of knowledge which gives the impression that terrorism studies is more of a narrow extension of counter-insurgency or national security studies than an open and inclusive domain of research into all forms and aspects of terrorism. Consequently, Andrew Silke (2001) concludes that terrorism studies ‘is largely driven by policy concerns’ and ‘largely limited to government agendas’ (p. 2).

In addition, the broader academic, social, and cultural influence of terrorism studies (through the authority and legitimacy provided by ‘terrorism experts’ to the media and as policy advisers, for example), means that this restrictive viewpoint is diffused to the broader society, which in turn generates its own ideological effects. Specifically, the distorted focus on non-state terrorism functions to reify state perspectives and priorities, and reinforce a state-centric, problem-solving paradigm of politics in which ‘terrorism’ is viewed as an identifiable social or individual problem in need of solving by the state, and not as a practice of state power, for example. From this perspective, it functions to maintain the legitimacy of state uses of violence and delegitimize all forms of non-state violence (which has its own ideological effects and is problematic in a number of obvious ways). This fundamental belief in the instrumental rationality of political violence as an effective and legitimate tool of the state is open to a great many criticisms, not least that it provides the normative basis from which non-state terrorist groups frequently justify their own (often well-intentioned) violence (see Burke 2008, Oliverio and Lauderdale 2005). There is from this viewpoint an ethical imperative to try and undermine the widespread acceptance that political violence is a mostly legitimate and effective option in resolving conflict – for either state or non-state actors. Political violence is in fact, a moral and physical disaster in the vast majority of cases.

From an ethical-normative perspective, such a restricted understanding of terrorism also functions to obscure and silence the voices and perspectives of those who live in conditions of daily terror from the random and arbitrary violence of their own governments, some of whom are supported by Western states. At the present juncture, it also functions to silence the voices of those who experience Western policies – directly, as in those tortured in the war on terror, and indirectly, as in those suffering under Western-supported regimes – as a form of terrorism. That is, it deflects and diverts attention from the much greater state terrorism which blights the lives of tens of millions of people around the world today.

Related to these broader normative and ideological effects, the treatment of state terrorism within the discourse – the silences on it and the narrow construction of ‘state-sponsored terrorism’ – also functions to position state terrorism (should it even exist within the dominant framework) as seemingly less important than non-state terrorism, and as confined to the actions that states take in support of non-state terrorism. This also distorts the field of knowledge and political practice by suggesting that the sponsorship of Palestinian groups by Iran for example, is an infinitely more serious and dangerous problem than the fact that millions of Colombians, Uzbeks, Zimbabweans, and so on, are daily terrorised by death squads, state torture, and serious human rights abuses. Within this discursive terrain, it can also function to provide legitimacy to Western policies such as sanctions, coercive diplomacy, and pre-emptive war against politically determined ‘state-sponsors of terrorism’ which may be terroristic themselves, and which ignore the involvement in state-sponsorship by Western states.

From a political-normative viewpoint, the silence on state terrorism, and in particular the argument of many terrorism scholars that state actions can never be defined as ‘terrorism’, actually functions to furnish states with a rhetorical justification for using what may actually be terroristic forms of violence against their opponents and citizens without fear of condemnation. In effect, it provides them with greater leeway for applying terror-based forms of violence against civilians, a leeway exploited by many states such as Israel, Russia, China, Uzbekistan, Zimbabwe, and others who try to intimidate groups with the application of massive and disproportionate state violence. From this perspective, a discourse which occludes and obscures the very possibility of state terrorism can be considered part of the conditions that actually makes state terrorism possible. In addition, the silence on state terrorism within the field also functions to undermine the political struggle of human rights activists against the use of terror by states by disallowing the delegitimizing power and resources that come from describing state actions as ‘terrorism’. It is pertinent to note in this context that the world's leading states have continually rejected any and all attempts to legally define and proscribe a category of actions which would be called 'state terrorism', arguing instead that such actions are already covered by other laws such as the laws of war (see Becker 2006).

The silence on state terrorism has another political effect, namely, the way in which it has functioned, and continues to function, to distract from and deny the long history of Western involvement in terrorism, thereby constructing Western foreign policy as essentially benign – rather than aimed at reifying existing structures of power and domination in the international system, for example. That is, by preventing the effective criticism of particular Western policies it works to maintain the dangerous myth of Western exceptionalism. This sense of exceptionalism and the supportive discourse of terrorism studies permits Western states and their allies to pursue a range of discrete political projects and partisan interests aimed at maintaining international dominance. For example, by reinforcing the notion that non-state terrorism is a much greater threat and problem than state terrorism and by obscuring the ways in which counter-terrorism can morph into state terrorism, the discourse functions to legitimise the current war on terror and its associated policies of military intervention, extraordinary rendition, reinforcement of the national security state, and the like. More specifically, the discourse can provide legitimacy to broader counter-insurgency or counter-terrorism programmes where the actual aims lie in the maintenance of a particular political-economic order such as is occurring in Colombia at present (see Stokes 2006). Importantly, the silence on state terrorism also functions to de-legitimise all forms of violent counter-hegemonic or revolutionary struggle (by maintaining the notion that state violence is automatically legitimate and all non-state violence is inherently illegitimate), thereby maintaining the liberal international order and many oppressive international power structures (see also Duffield 2001). Lastly, the discourse can be used to selectively justify particular projects of regime change,¹⁴ economic sanctions, military base expansion, military occupation, military assistance for strategic partners, and the isolation of disapproved political movements such as Hamas or Hezbollah.

In the end, the discourse functions to permit the reification and extension of state hegemony both internationally and domestically, and perhaps more importantly, the belief in the instrumental rationality of violence as an effective tool of politics. Despite the intentions of terrorism scholars therefore, who may feel that they engage in objective academic analysis of a clearly defined phenomenon, the discourse actually serves a number of distinctly political purposes and has several important ideological consequences for society.

Conclusion

As noted above, there is a real puzzle revealed through this analysis, namely, why there is such a deep and pervasive silence on state terrorism within the discourse, especially given the genealogical origins of the term and the mountain of empirical examples of the phenomenon? There are a number of likely answers to this puzzle. In the first place, there may be cases in which scholars have been co-opted through various means into state perspectives and projects. Given the benefits that can accrue from close association with state power, it is not surprising that some scholars choose to participate directly in such projects. Related to this, some scholars may be intimidated by state power, fearing the ways in which state officials and state apologists can punish and harm scholars who apply the term 'terrorism' to state actions. This could be a major reason why the silence on Israeli state terrorism is so pervasive. In the U.S. at least, scholars who criticise Israeli policies in public are regularly attacked and intimidated as anti-Semitic. Alternately, many scholars who joined the field following the terrorist attacks in 2001 did so out of a genuine desire to work with the U.S. government to prevent further occurrences of such atrocities.

¹⁴ As Carol Winkler (2006) has noted, official claims that the target state provides support for non-state terrorism has preceded virtually every U.S. military intervention since the Reagan era.

Another reason is likely to be simply the failure of academic procedure and scholarly reflection – the failure to interrogate and question the assumptions and accepted knowledge of the field. This is related to a broader process of socialisation into the accepted discourse and practices of the field; scholars are trained into viewing terrorism in a particular light. Related to this, most scholars feel an inherent affinity to the values and interests of their own societies, which may make facing the reality of their government's involvement in terrorist atrocities difficult and disturbing. Finally, it may be related to the inherent difficulties involved in studying state terrorism: not only is obtaining primary data a challenging exercise, especially in cases where state agents may want to prevent potentially damaging international publicity, but a great deal of conceptual and theoretical work often has to be done to determine which acts constitute state terrorism (Blakeley forthcoming).

In the end however, the puzzle of why state terrorism has been so neglected in the field is less important than recognising that there are important reasons for 'bringing the state back into terrorism studies' (Blakeley 2007). First, there are obvious analytical reasons for taking state terrorism seriously, including the imbalances and distortions which a narrow focus on non-state terrorism introduces. Second, there are normative reasons for studying state terrorism in a rigorous and systematic manner, notably that such knowledge furnishes a powerful means of holding states to account for their actions and reinforcing norms of behaviour that exclude the use of violence to intimidate and terrorise civilians. By any measure, states have been responsible for infinitely more human suffering and terror than any other actor; the promotion of human security therefore depends on protecting citizens from the abuses and predations of states.

In conclusion, exposing the ideological effects and political technologies of the discourse has the potential to open up critical space for the articulation of alternative and potentially emancipatory forms of knowledge and practice. The good news is that discourses are never completely hegemonic; there is always room for counter-hegemonic struggle and subversive forms of knowledge. In this case, not only is the discourse inherently unstable and vulnerable to different forms of critique, but the continual setbacks in Iraq and Afghanistan, ongoing revelations of state torture and rendition by Western forces, and increasing resistance to government attempts to restrict civil liberties suggest that the present juncture provides an opportune moment to engage in deliberate and sustained critique of a dominant discourse which focuses on non-state actors and obscures the much greater terrorism of state actors.

References

Aretxaga, B., 2000. A fictional reality: paramilitary death squads and the construction of state terror in Spain. In: J. Sluka, ed., Death squad: an anthropology of state terror. University of Pennsylvania Press.

Barker, J., 2002. The no-nonsense guide to terrorism. New Internationalist.

Becker, T., 2006. Terrorism and the state: rethinking the rules of state responsibility. Oxford: Hart Publishing.

Blakeley, R., forthcoming. State terrorism in the global south: foreign policy, neoliberalism and human rights. London: Routledge.

Blakeley, R., 2007. Bringing the state back into terrorism studies. European Political Science, 6 (3), 228-235.

Blakeley, R., 2006. Still training to torture? US training of military forces from Latin America. Third World Quarterly, 27 (8), 1439-1461.

Burke, A., 2008. The end of terrorism studies. Critical Studies on Terrorism, 1 (1), 37-49.

Burnett, J., and Whyte, D., 2005. Embedded expertise and the new terrorism. Journal for Crime, Conflict and the Media, 1 (4), 1-18.

Byman, D., 2005. Confronting passive sponsors of terrorism, Analysis Paper, No. 4, The Saban Center for Middle East Policy, The Brookings Institution.

Cohen, I., and Corrado, R., 2005. State torture in the contemporary world. International Journal of Comparative Sociology, 46 (1-2), 103-131.

Dell, M., 2002. Learning curve: the United States and the future of Pakistan. Harvard International Review, 24, 34-38.

Doty, R., 1993. Foreign policy as social construction: a post-positivist analysis of U.S. counterinsurgency policy in the Philippines. International Studies Quarterly, 37, 297-320.

Dreyfus, R., 2005. Our monsters in Iraq. TomPaine.com, 18 November 2005. Available at: http://www.tompaine.com/articles/2005/11/18/our_monsters_in_iraq.php. [Accessed March 16, 2008].

Duffield, M., 2001. Global governance and the new wars: the merging of development and security. London: Zed Books.

Gareau, F., 2004. State terrorism and the United States: from counterinsurgency to the war on terrorism. London: Zed Books.

George, A., 1991a. Western state terrorism. Cambridge: Polity Press;

George, A., 1991b. The discipline of terrorology. In: A. George, ed. Western State Terrorism. Cambridge: Polity.

George, A., 1971. The development of doctrine and strategy. In: A. George, D. Hall and W. R. Simons, eds., The limits of coercive diplomacy. Little Brown.

Gibbs, J., 1989. Conceptualization of terrorism. American Sociological Review, 54 (3), 329-340.

Goodin, R., 2006. What's wrong with terrorism? Cambridge: Polity Press.

- Gordon, A., 2004. Terrorism and knowledge growth: a databases and internet analysis. In: A. Silke, ed. Research on terrorism: trends, achievements and failures. London: Frank Cass.
- Gordon, A., 1999. Terrorism dissertations and the evolution of a speciality: an analysis of meta-information. Terrorism and Political Violence, 11 (2), 141-50.
- Grann, D., 2001. Giving 'the Devil' his due. The Atlantic Monthly, 287 (6) 55-75.
- Grey, S., 2006. Ghost plane: the inside story of the CIA's secret rendition programme. Hurst/St Martin's Press.
- Grosscup, B., 2006. Strategic terror: the politics and ethics of aerial bombardment. London: Zed Books.
- Herman, E., 1982. The real terror network: terrorism in fact and propaganda. South End Press.
- Herman, E., and O'Sullivan, G., 1989. The 'terrorism' industry: the experts and institutions that shape our view of terror. Pantheon Books.
- Hersh, S., 2005. Up in the air. New Yorker, December 2005.
- Hindess, B., 2006. Terrortory. Alternatives, 31, 243-57.
- Hoffman, B., 1998. Inside terrorism. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Jackson, R., 2007a. Constructing enemies: 'Islamic terrorism' in political and academic discourse. Government & Opposition, 42 (3), 394-426.
- Jackson, R., 2007b. Critical reflection on counter-sanctuary discourse. In: M. Innes, ed. Denial of sanctuary: understanding terrorist safe havens. Westport, CT: Praeger Security International.
- Jackson, R., 2007c. Playing the politics of fear: writing the terrorist threat in the war on terrorism. In: G. Kassimeris, ed. Playing politics with terrorism: a user's guide. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Jackson, R., 2005. Writing the war on terrorism: language, politics and counterterrorism. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Kurlantzick, J., 2002. Guerrillas in our midst: is the United States harbouring terrorists? The American Prospect, 3 June 2002, 14-16.
- Laffey, M., and Weldes, J., 1997. Beyond belief: ideas and symbolic technologies in the study of international relations. European Journal of International Relations, 3 (2), 193-237.
- Laqueur, W., 1977. Terrorism. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.

- Mamdani, M., 2004. Good Muslim, bad Muslim: America, the Cold War, and the roots of terror. Three Leaves Press.
- Martin, G., 2003. Understanding terrorism: challenges, perspectives, and issues. Thousand Oaks: Sage.
- McSherry, J. P., 2002. Tracking the origins of a state terror network: Operation Condor. Latin American Perspectives, 29 (1), 38-60.
- Meacher, M., 2005. Britain now faces its own blowback. Intelligence interests may thwart the July bombings investigation. The Guardian, 10 September 2005.
- Milliken, J., 1999. The study of discourse in international relations: a critique of research and methods. European Journal of International Relations, 5 (2), 225-54.
- Oliverio, A., and Lauderdale, P., 2005. Terrorism as deviance or social control: suggestions for future research. International Journal of Comparative Sociology, 46 (1-2), 153-169.
- Purvis, T., and Hunt, A., 1993. Discourse, ideology, discourse, ideology, discourse, ideology.... British Journal of Sociology, 44 (3), 473-99.
- RAND, 2006. RAND-MIP Terrorism Incident Database Project. Available at: <http://www.rand.org/ise/projects/terrorismdatabase/index.html>. [Accessed 16 March 2008].
- Raphael, S., 2007. Putting the state back in: the orthodox definition of terrorism and the critical need to address state terrorism. Paper prepared for the British International Studies Association (BISA) annual conference, 17-19 December, 2007, University of Cambridge, United Kingdom. Available at: <http://www.bisa.ac.uk/2007/tuesday.htm>.
- Reid, E., 1997. Evolution of a body of knowledge: an analysis of terrorism research. Information Processing & Management, 33 (1), 91-106.
- Robin, C., 2004. Fear: the history of a political idea. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rummel, R., 1994. Death by government. Transaction Books.
- Sanchez, M., 2004. Moral misstep: some terrorists get a hero's welcome. Washington Post, 3 September 2004. Available at: <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A57838-2004Sept2.html>.
- Schmid, A., and Jongman, A., 1988. Political terrorism: a new guide to actors, authors, concepts, databases, theories and literature. Oxford: North Holland.
- Sharlach, L., 2008. Veil and four walls: a state of terror in Pakistan. Critical Studies on Terrorism, 1 (1), 95-110.
- Shepherd, J., 2007. The rise and rise of terrorism studies. The Guardian, July 3, 2007.

- Silke, A., 2004. The road less travelled. In: A. Silke, ed. Research on terrorism: trends, achievements and failures. London: Frank Cass.
- Silke, A., 2001. The devil you know: continuing problems with research on terrorism. Terrorism and Political Violence, 13 (4), 1-14.
- Sloan, S., 2006. Terrorism: the present threat in context. Oxford: Berg.
- Sluka, J., ed., 2000a. Death squad: an anthropology of state terror. University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Sluka, J., 2000b. Introduction: state terror and anthropology. In: J. Sluka, ed., Death squad: an anthropology of state terror. University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Sluka, J., 2000c. 'For God and Ulster': the culture of terror and loyalist death squads in Northern Ireland. In: J. Sluka, ed., Death squad: an anthropology of state terror. University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Stohl, M., 2006. The state as terrorist: insights and implications. Democracy and Security, 2, 1-25.
- Stohl, M., 1988. States, terrorism and state terrorism: the role of the superpowers. In: R. Slater and M. Stohl, eds. Current perspectives on international terrorism. Macmillan.
- Michael Stohl and George Lopez, eds., 1986. Government Violence and Repression: An Agenda for Research, ed. Bernard Johnpoll, Contributions in Political Science, New York: Greenwood;
- Stohl, M., and Lopez, G., eds., 1984. The state as terrorist: the dynamics of governmental violence and repression. Westport: Greenwood Press.
- Stokes, D., 2006. 'Iron fists in iron gloves': the political economy of US terrorocracy promotion in Colombia. The British Journal of Politics & International Relations, 8 (3), 368-387.
- Stokes, D., 2004. America's other war: terrorizing Colombia. London: Zed Books.
- Thakrah, J., 2004. Dictionary of terrorism. 2nd edition, London: Routledge.
- Townsend, C., 2002. Terrorism: a very short introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Wilkinson, P., 2001. Terrorism vs democracy: the liberal state response. London: Frank Cass.
- Winkler, C., 2006. In the name of terrorism: presidents on political violence in the post-world war II era. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Yee, A., 1996. The causal effects of ideas on politics. International Organization, 50 (1), 69-108.

Zulaika, J., and Douglass, W., 1996. Terror and taboo: the follies, fables, and faces of terrorism. London: Routledge.