

UCC Library and UCC researchers have made this item openly available.
Please let us know how this has helped you. Thanks!

Title	Netflix Nostalgia: Screening the Past on Demand, edited by Kathryn Pallister, and The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV: Production Design and the Boomer Era, by Alex Bevan
Author(s)	Fradley, Martin
Editor(s)	Mulvey, James
Publication date	2020
Original citation	Fradley, M. (2020) 'Netflix Nostalgia: Screening the Past on Demand, edited by Kathryn Pallister, and The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV: Production Design and the Boomer Era, by Alex Bevan', Alphaville: Journal of Film and Screen Media , 19, pp. 230-241. doi: 10.33178/alpha.19.22
Type of publication	Review
Link to publisher's version	http://www.alphavillejournal.com/Issue19/ReviewFradley.pdf http://dx.doi.org/10.33178/alpha.19.22 Access to the full text of the published version may require a subscription.
Rights	© 2020, the Author(s). This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International License . https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/4.0/
Item downloaded from	http://hdl.handle.net/10468/10281

Downloaded on 2021-11-27T12:12:17Z

Netflix Nostalgia: Screening the Past on Demand*, edited by Kathryn Pallister.
Lexington Books, 2019, 260 pp.

The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV: Production Design and the Boomer Era*, by Alex Bevan.
Bloomsbury Academic, 2019, 245 pp.

Martin Fradley

It scarcely needs pointing out that “nostalgia” has become a highly contentious battleground in recent years. Since the European Union referendum and the election of Donald Trump in 2016, a backwards-looking retreat into regressive nationalist mythologies has been widely understood as ideologically symptomatic of liberal democracies still reeling from the economic implosion of 2007–2008. Typically seen as a reactionary tendency of the political Right, the nostalgic amnesia of the progressive Left is equally self-evident in sentimental mourning for both the pro-hegemonic Obama presidency and the UK’s membership of a market-driven European Union. It would be a mistake, however, to understand this brand of nostalgic regress as simply a post-2016 phenomenon. As Simon Reynolds points out in Retromania, the “end of history” has heralded a neurotic preoccupation with the past. “Instead of being about itself,” Reynolds muses, “the 2000s have been about every other previous decade happening again all at once: a simultaneity of pop time that abolishes history while nibbling away at the present’s sense of itself as an era with a distinct identity and feel” (x–xi).

As Reynolds suggests, there is a paradox at the heart of twenty-first century nostalgia. Rather than heralding a forward-looking ethos, the digital age seems acutely preoccupied with days gone by. As such, the nostalgic imaginary—the rejection of a dissatisfying present in favour of an idealised past—is manifest in a series of high-profile televisual artefacts. These include successful reruns of analogue-era shows such as Friends (1994–2004) on digital platforms; reboots and revivals like Gilmore Girls: A Day in the Life (2016), Twin Peaks: The Return (2017), The X-Files (1993–2018), Roseanne (1988–2018), Will and Grace (1998–) and The L Word: Generation Q (2019–); twenty-first century reimaginings of earlier serials—Lost in Space (2018–), One Day at a Time (2017–), Chilling Adventures of Sabrina (2018–)—and a swathe of period dramas including Downton Abbey (2010–2015), Peaky Blinders (2013–), Halt and Catch Fire (2014–2017), The Crown (2016–), The Marvellous Mrs Maisel (2017–) and The Deuce (2017–2019). Inevitably bound up in fractious contemporary debates, both these books are deeply informed by contemporary identity politics and the competing shibboleths of the twenty-first century culture wars.

As many of the contributors to Netflix Nostalgia: Screening the Past on Demand point out, the contemporary nostalgia economy is a highly lucrative marketing niche. Beginning as a DVD rental service before evolving into an online platform for streaming classic movies, Netflix has nostalgia written into its brand identity. As Kathryn Pallister points out in her introduction, Netflix's business model relies heavily on the emotional potency of nostalgic affect to lure older subscribers. More significant, however, are the cultural, ontological and ideological functions of nostalgia; that is, the political impetus to re-evaluate the past through its juxtaposition with the present. Netflix Nostalgia's opening salvo of essays thus frame the company's output within conceptual models of the nostalgic mode. These range from the ubiquitous (Svetlana Boym), the canonical (Frederic Jameson) and on through more recent interventions (Ryan Lizardi; Katharina Niemeyer; Gilad Padva; Michael Pickering and Emily Keightly; William Proctor). Giulia Taurino begins by outlining the industrial logic underpinning the production of nostalgic content. Employing Scream: The TV Series (2015–) as a case study, Taurino provocatively underscores Netflix's algorithmic reification of collective memory. In a bleak mise en abyme of commercially mediated nostalgia, Scream is a serialised reboot of a successful 1990s film franchise that was itself founded upon nostalgia for horror movies from the late 1970s–early 1980s—a series of “slasher” films which were themselves cinematic love letters to earlier genre classics Psycho (Alfred Hitchcock, 1960) and Peeping Tom (Michael Powell, 1960).

Conversely, Matthias Stephan argues that Netflix's nostalgic output provides an affirmative psychical bulwark against bleak postmillennial realities. “Netflix Originals presents the streaming service an opportunity to root its programming in a highly affective and emotional frame, connecting viewers longing for the perceived stability of the past with the Netflix brand” (26). Stephan views Riverdale (2017–) and GLOW (2017–) as forms of televisual self-care, an empathic reading which becomes increasingly shaky in its straight-faced understanding of kitsch reimaginations of the 1980s as a psycho-therapeutic “safe space”. Similarly preoccupied with representations of that decade, Phillipe Gauthier's examination of Boym's critically exhausted “restorative” and “reflective” nostalgic modes in GLOW is somewhat underwhelming, but his lucid rejection of nostalgia as a political monolith underscores Netflix Nostalgia's critical strengths. “Nostalgia, by virtue of its chaotic and multiple nature, cannot convey a single vision of the world,” Gauthier notes shrewdly (85).

This embrace of nostalgia as a polyvocal phenomenon is also illustrated by various engagements with Stranger Things (2016–), a 1980s-set telefantasy which has gained near-totemic status in discussions of digital-age nostalgia. Matthias Stephan, for example, finds progressive respite in Stranger Things's benign combination of 1980s intertextuality and retrofitted cultural politics. Similarly, Joseph M. Sirianni understands Stranger Things's evocative period aesthetic as benignly reassuring. Noting that nostalgic populism is a symptom of social, political and economic crisis, Sirianni counterintuitively valorises the affective seductions of the Duffer brothers' period phantasmagoria:

If Stranger Things and other nostalgic television programmes can work to generate positive feelings within the present, provide a temporary safe haven from current troubles, and serve as a source of aspiration for the future then ... that is good nostalgic television. (196–7)

It is perhaps indicative of the broader limitations of Netflix Nostalgia that this politically insipid endorsement of Stranger Things so closely echoes—but ideologically inverts—Andrew Britton's key points in his seminal critique of Reaganite entertainment. However, this reduction of the fractious 1980s to a largely apolitical safety blanket is challenged by Heather Freeman. Contrasting the ongoing success of Stranger Things with the premature cancellation of 1990s-set teen comedy Everything Sucks! (2018), Freeman places the two serials on opposing ends of a political spectrum. While Everything Sucks! is praised for its “capacious, queer-centered, antipatriarchal nostalgia”, in Freeman’s view Stranger Things resurrects an insidious Reaganite agenda which chimes with Trump-era political regress (103). My issue here is not necessarily that Freeman is wrong in her assessment of the conservative gender/sexual politics of Stranger Things, but more that this reductive brand of Buzzfeed-citing critique is practically algorithmic in its rhetorical trajectory. Indeed, I was reminded here of Theresa L. Geller’s work on 1980s-set horror film It (Andy Muschietti, 2017). Interpreting the film as a Trumpian parable of transphobic disgust, Geller’s intervention is best understood—like Freeman’s—less as screen criticism and more as ideologically opportunist sophistry from the frontlines of the culture wars.

There is little of this modishly woke rhetoric in John C. Murray’s combative critique of corporate hegemony, “The Consumer Has Been Added to Your Video Queue”. Unapologetically citing an array of deeply unfashionable thinkers—Lyotard, Adorno, Debord, Lacan, Derrida, Horkheimer—Murray’s polemic is straight out of the Frankfurt School. “[T]he growing demand for intuitive and multiplatform services, such as Netflix, have nurtured a synthetic culture of passive voyeurs,” he writes with anachronistic fervour. “[C]onsumers are misdirected by affiliational thinking, and fall prey to a metanarrative of mass populism as the new form of anticritical intellectual banality” (57–8). As much a critical evisceration of postmaterialist scholarly orthodoxy as it is a condemnation of consumer “choice”, Murray’s essay is a self-conscious reminder of a time before lexical banalities (“problematic”, “negotiation”) came to dominate film and television scholarship. Politically intransigent and resolutely out of time, Murray’s prose is unmistakably imbued with the profound homesickness of nostalgia.

Traces of Murray’s neo-Marxist discontent can be found elsewhere, however. Ande Davies’ engaging essay on The Get Down (2016–2017) and Luke Cage (2016–2018) understands both serials as rejecting the assimilationist impulses of neoliberal postracialism. Cast almost entirely with people of colour, their vibrant fusion of blaxpotation, kung-fu stylings and hip-hop pastiche informs multiple levels of nostalgic—and ethnofuturist—address. Although class struggle remains largely a latent presence in Davies’ analysis, his interest in distinctively racialised aesthetics nevertheless offers an intriguing framework through which to rethink the limits of televisual realism in related Netflix content, such as Dolemite Is My Name (Craig Brewer, 2019) and When They See Us (Ava DuVernay, 2019). Similarly, Jacinta Yanders’s discussion of Latinx representation in One Day at a Time focuses upon the specificities of Cuban-American heritage and socio-cultural experience. Despite its insightful overview of the way the reimagined show combines generic familiarity with antiassimilationist politics, Yanders’s essay is undermined by its somewhat polemical positioning of other 2010s revivals as evidence of white ethno-nationalist backlash. In particular, Yanders’s reductive understanding of the now-toxic Roseanne—a groundbreaking sitcom from the Reagan-Bush era about a struggling working-class family headed by a gender nonconforming matriarch—crudely negates that series’ counter-hegemonic innovations. Looking beyond Roseanne Barr’s self-inflicted downfall, “cancel culture” is revealed to be as amnesiac and ideologically self-righteous as the phenomenon of nostalgia itself.

Yanders’s essay also typifies how Netflix Nostalgia effectively renders any backward-looking televisual artefact “nostalgic” by default. This persistent conceptual looseness raises further issues. Is nostalgic affect really triggered by One Day at a Time or Lost in Space when both shows bear only superficial resemblance to their original incarnations? Can House of Cards (2013–2018) be described as “nostalgic” when so few of its viewers will be aware of the BBC original? What nostalgic specificities are elided when essayist Sheri Chinen Biesen draws little distinction between viewers’ affective investments in—to take just a few examples—the quasi-medieval world of Game of Thrones (2011–2019), the Weimar Germany of Babylon Berlin (2017–) or the sprawling historical locales of The Crown, Outlander (2014–) and Narcos (2015–2017)? More pointedly, when Yanders ponders whether reboots of “white” serials with newly-installed Latinx casts—Charmed (2018–), Party of Five (2020–) and Roswell, New Mexico (2019–)—will follow in One Day at a Time’s culturally specific footsteps, one has to consider where pre-sold nostalgia ends and the reification of ethnicity begins.

If these sometimes-troubling questions suggest largely discomfiting answers, it is pleasing that two of the most intriguing entries in Netflix Nostalgia epitomise the book’s strengths. Keshia McClantoc’s contribution examines the celebrated “San Junipero” (Owen Harris, 2016) episode of Black Mirror as a critical interrogation of nostalgic longing itself. Drawing on the work of Gilad Padva, “San Junipero”’s hyperreal rendering of the 1980s is interpreted as a queer-friendly, John Hughes-infused fever-dream in which ageing protagonists Kelly (Gugu Mbatha-Raw) and Yorkie (Mackenzie Davies) are able to digitally rewrite their tragic personal histories. What pulls McClantoc’s essay back from blithely endorsing the political cul-de-sac of simulated utopianism is its alertness to the gothic underside of digital wish-fulfilment. As easily read as a critique of transhuman dystopia as it is a saccharine endorsement of sanitised nostalgia, the episode’s unsettling ambivalence imbues “San Junipero” with lingering, uncanny affect.

Digital capitalism’s voracious reification of memory and sociality is also at the heart of Patricia Campbell and Kathryn Pallister’s discussion of 13 Reasons Why (2017–). Controversially built around the suicide of high-school student Hannah Baker (Katherine Langford), the surviving teenagers in 13 Reasons Why fetishise obsolete analogue technologies as a psycho-social “coping mechanism” in an age of ubiquitous social media (205). Reading the series as an ambivalent treatise on the ontological investments of “technostalgia”, Campbell and Pallister’s analysis of 13 Reasons Why is reminiscent of Thomas B. Byers’s insightful work on reactionary nostalgia in Terminator 2: Judgement Day (James Cameron, 1991), suggesting that the cultural anxieties explored in 13 Reasons Why are as cyclical as they are presentist. Like the similarly themed Euphoria (2019–), Campbell and Pallister’s nuanced essay ultimately finds thematic complexity in the way 13 Reasons Why rebuffs the atomised individualism and compulsory positivity of neoliberal culture, valorising a reflective teen melodrama that is unafraid to explore the contradictions of (post-) modernity.

Sidestepping the theoretical models of nostalgia that underpin much of Netflix Nostalgia, the cultural politics of retro production design are the central focus of Alex Bevan’s The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV: Production Design and the Boomer Era. Rejecting “traditional, patriarchal definitions of authorship and high art” (4), Bevan valorises “production studies” as a critically holistic way to understand revisionist serials like Mad Men (2007–2015), Masters of Sex (2013–2016) and The Knick (2014–2015). Bevan adopts a quasi-ethnographic approach which highlights the importance of below-the-line creative labour. “I want to open up the television image to new modes of analysis and interpretation,” she posits. “What stories do coffee tables and wallpaper tell?” (1).

Like Netflix Nostalgia, The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV is politically contextualised by the global pre-eminence of the archetypal “boomer”, Donald J. Trump:

[T]he timeliness of a book on US nostalgia in the context of the global rise of ethno-nationalism feels equal parts an opportunity and a burden. The political weight of the these shows about white yesteryear has never felt more important and pressing. (xiv)

To this end, the cover of The Aesthetic of Nostalgia TV features a glamorous image of Joan Harris (Christina Hendricks), a character whose confidently stylish appearance functions as bitterly ironic register for the gender, racial and class iniquities of the mid-century “boomer era” as much as it serves as semiotic shorthand for postwar prosperity. As Bevan notes, the iconicity of this period is so inextricably bound up with hegemonic conceptions of US national identity that both the National Museum of American History and the Smithsonian acquired props and costumes from Mad Men for permanent display. Uninterested in the verisimilitude of televisual depictions of American history, Bevan’s critical framing of nostalgia TV is unambiguously contemporary. “In this book, nostalgia is defined as the recreation and repurposing of constructed imaginations of a collective past for the political and social purposes of the present,” she states (133).

Organising her book around three core aspects of production design—sets, props, costumes—Bevan’s first case studies engage with serials featuring contemporary settings. Here, Bevan reads the set design of Desperate Housewives (2004–2012) and Ugly Betty (2006–2010) as in reflexive dialogue with generic antecedents. Filmed using recycled sets on the same backlots as Leave it to Beaver (1957–1963) and The Munsters (1964–1966), the anachronistic production design of Desperate Housewives constantly recalls the ideologically overdetermined spectre of mid-century suburbia and the white, middle-class family home. In similar fashion, the structural inequalities of the contemporary workplace are dialectically critiqued via Betty Suarez’s (America Ferrera) garish vintage clothing in Ugly Betty. Echoing the likes of Batman (1966–1968) and Get Smart (1965–1970), Ugly Betty comically satirises the pro-hegemonic imperatives of modernist office space, Suarez’s idiosyncratic stylings telling an ideologically dissident story of assimilation, diaspora and the arbitrary precepts of white supremacy.

When Bevan hits her critical stride the results can be fascinating, and her understanding of nostalgia as a multilayered and often contradictory cultural phenomenon is often exemplary. Writing about the celebrated period detail in Mad Men, for example, Bevan argues that the use of vintage props eludes simple labels of nostalgic regression or escapism, but instead creates a highly reflexive arena. “Mad Men is a period piece,” she writes, “but one where the past haunts the present and the present haunts the past” (86). Detailing the series’ fetishistic insistence upon employing authentic period items—1960s bottles of Bayer children’s aspirin, say—Bevan identifies digital-era angst amidst faultless period style. Will production designers continue to fastidiously source original props in the age of 3D printing and seamless CGI? Elsewhere, lively analysis of the diasporic politics registered in Ugly Betty’s deft blending of Mexican rasquache with Christian Dior’s postwar “New Look” or Mad Men’s resonant cladding of Betty Draper (January Jones) in an iconic 1950s “shirt-dress” more than justify Bevan’s methodological fervour. “The shirt-dress recalls the 1950s suburban housewife,” she notes sharply. “[I]t invokes whiteness; it intimates the oppression of certain publics and the total elision of others” (138).

There are also insightful passages on Pan Am (2011) and Masters of Sex—the former read as post-recession corporate nostalgia; the latter as an exercise in neo-Foucauldian historicism—but these are frustratingly brief. In many ways, this is symptomatic of The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV more broadly, a volume which often lurches unsteadily between lucid critical precision and woeful self-indulgence. Why does the thoughtful Masters of Sex warrant only a few pages when the author spends so much time discussing serials—Downton Abbey, The Americans (2013–2018), Westworld (2016–), The 1900 House (1999–2000)—that have nothing to do with the mid-century United States? It is ironic that such an ambitious book devotes so much time to critical meandering, and the trajectory of each chapter soon becomes depressingly familiar: a focused and intelligent opening followed by endlessly repetitive padding. As such, the book’s methodological grandstanding frequently falls flat. Interviews with creative personnel like Janie Bryant (Mad Men) and Eduardo Castro (Ugly Betty) add little to the author’s own prose, while Bevan’s vaunted “field research”—a quasi-impressionistic account of the author’s visit to the Mad Men set, for example—tends toward the anecdotal.

Moreover, the book’s Oedipal posturing and self-defined “emo kid bitterness” (xv) soon begin to grate. The revisionist memory work of Mad Men, Bevan contends, “coincides with a generational critique of the excesses of the late-twentieth [and] early-twenty-first parents whose legacy is a global economic recession and irreparable ecological damage” (151). Even allowing for the popular currency of intergenerational snark—the “Ok boomer” meme its briefly popular apogee—Bevan’s rhetoric here is sweeping and painfully oversimplified. Elsewhere, a brusque sideswipe at the “neoliberalist” (178) scholarly work of John Fiske and Henry Jenkins seems similarly motivated by the desublimated fury of the “twittering machine” (Seymour). This incoherent tone is epitomised by the book’s nadir: a worryingly hagiographic endorsement of interviewee Janie Bryant’s vintage fashion range. Lacking even the ambivalence of Netflix’s noughties-nostalgic Girlboss (2017)—a deceptively intelligent serial which understands the seductive “neoliberalist” pitfalls of branded selfhood and the retro-economy—in passages like these Bevan undid much of this reader’s critical goodwill.

The celebrated final episode of Mad Men, “Person to Person”, concludes with Don Draper (John Hamm) conceiving an iconic Coca-Cola advertisement while meditating at an idyllic coastal retreat. While Bevan dubs this “a hippy commune” (xv), it is more likely that the locale was specifically inspired by the philosophical birthplace of neoliberal selfhood, the Esalen Institute in Big Sur, California (Storr). If Mad Men’s famous denouement carries the uncanny sting of free market triumphalism, it is perhaps appropriate that neither of these books fully account for the nostalgic dynamic of so much contemporary television. While Bevan and contributors to Netflix Nostalgia rail against “presentism”—that is, understanding the past entirely through the lens of present-day values—both these books are marked by the misplaced surety of an identity politics which remain unwittingly in thrall to the neoliberal status quo. As ever, the past has much to teach us about how we always know less than we think—a lesson that these books, for all their undoubted insights, too often fail to heed.

References

The Americans. Created by Joseph Weisberg, Amblin Television/Dreamworks Television, 2013–2018.

- Babylon Berlin*. Created by Henk Handloegten, Tom Tykwer and Achin von Borries, X-Filme Creative Pool/ARD Degeto Film/Beta Film/Sky Deutschland/Danmarks Radion (DR), 2017–.
- Batman*. Created by Lorenzo Semple Jr. and William Dozier, Twentieth Century Fox Television/Greenway Productions, 1966–1968.
- Black Mirror*. Created by Charlie Brooker, Zeppotron/Channel Four Television Corporation/Gran Babiaka, 2011–.
- Boardwalk Empire*. Created by Terence Winter, HBO/Leverage Management/Closest to the Hole Productions/Sikelia Productions/Cold Front Productions, 2010–2014.
- Boym, Svetlana. The Future of Nostalgia. Basic Books, 2001.
- Britton, Andrew. “Blissing Out: The Politics of Reaganite Entertainment.” Movie, no. 31/32, 1986, pp. 1–42.
- Byers, Thomas B. “Terminating the Postmodern: Masculinity and Pomophobia.” Modern Fiction Studies, vol. 41, no. 1, 1995, pp. 35–73, DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1353/mfs.1995.0008>.
- Charmed*. Created by Constance M. Burge, Jessica O’Toole, Amy Rardin, and Jennie Snyder Urman, Poppy Productions/Reveal Entertainment/Propagate/CBS Television Studios, 2018–.
- Charmed*. Created by Constance M. Burge, Spelling Television/Northshore Productions/Paramount Pictures/Viacom Productions/Worldvision Enterprises, 1998–2006.
- Chilling Adventures of Sabrina*. Created by Roberto Aguirre-Sarcasa, Archie Comics Publications/Warner Bros. Television, 2018–.
- The Crown*. Created by Peter Morgan, Left Bank Pictures/Sony Pictures Television Production UK, 2016–.
- The Deuce*. Created by George Pelecanos and David Simon, Blown Deadline Productions, 2017–2019.
- Desperate Housewives*. Created by Marc Cherry, Cherry Alley Productions/Cherry Productions/Touchstone Television/ABC Studios, 2004–2012.
- Dolemite Is My Name*. Directed by Craig Brewer, Davis Entertainment/Netflix, 2019.
- Downton Abbey*. Created by Julian Fellowes, Carnival Film and Television/Masterpiece Theatre, 2010–2015.
- Euphoria*. Created by Sam Levinson, A24/HBO/Little Lamb/The Reasonable Bunch, 2019–.
- Everything Sucks!* Created by Ben York Jones and Michael Mohan, Midnight Radio, 2018.
- Fiske, John. Television Culture. Methuen, 1987.

- Friends*. Created by David Crane and Marta Kauffman, Bright/Kaufman/Crane Productions, Warner Bros. Television, 1994–2004.
- Game of Thrones*. Created by David Benioff and D. B. Weiss, HBO/Television 360/Grok! Studio/Generator Entertainment/Bighead Littlehead, 2011–2019.
- Geller, Theresa L. “Shilling Pennywise: Chump Change in Trump’s (Trans) America.” Make America Hate Again: Trump-Era Horror and the Politics of Fear, edited by Victoria McCollum, Routledge, 2019, pp. 32–53.
- The Get Down*. Created by Stephan Adly Guirgis and Baz Luhrmann, Bazmark Films/Sony Pictures Television, 2016–2017.
- Get Smart*. Created by Mel Brooks and Buck Henry, Talent Associates/CBS Television Network, 1965–1970.
- Gilmore Girls*. Created by Amy Sherman-Palladino, Dorothy Parker Drank Here Productions/Hofflund/Polone/Warner Bros. Television, 2000–2007.
- Gilmore Girls: A Day in the Life*. Created by Amy Sherman-Palladino, Warner Bros. Television, 2016.
- Girlboss*. Created by Kay Cannon, Netflix, 2017.
- GLOW*. Created by Liz Flahive and Carly Mensch, Tilted Productions/Perhapsatron/Fan Dancer/Netflix, 2017–.
- Halt and Catch Fire*. Created by Christopher Cantwell and Christopher C. Rogers, AMC Studios, 2014–2017.
- House of Cards*. British Broadcasting Corporation, 1990.
- House of Cards*. Created by Beau Willimon, Media Rights Capital/Netflix/Panic Pictures (II)/Trigger Street Productions, 2013–2018.
- It*. Directed by Andy Muschietti, New Line Cinema/RatPac-Dune Entertainment/Vertigo Entertainment/Lin Pictures/KatzSmith Productions, 2017.
- Jameson, Frederic. Postmodernism, or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism. Verso, 1991.
- Jenkins, Henry. Convergence Culture: Where Old and New Media Collide. New York UP, 2006.
- The Knick*. Created by Jack Amiel and Michael Begler, Anonymous Content, 2014–2015.
- Lizardi, Ryan. Mediated Nostalgia: Individual Memory and Contemporary Mass Media. Lexington Books, 2014.
- Leave It to Beaver*. Created by Joe Connelly, Bob Mosher, and Dick Conway, Gomalco Productions/Kayro-Vue Productions/Revue Studios, 1957–1963.

- Lost in Space*. Created by Irwin Allen, Irwin Allen Productions/Jodi Productions Inc./Van Bernard Productions/Twentieth Century Fox Television/CBS Television Network, 1965–1968.
- Lost in Space*. Created by Irwin Allen, Matt Sazama and Maxwell Jenkins, Legendary Television/Synthesis Productions/Applebox Pictures/Clickety-Clack Productions, 2018–.
- Luke Cage*. Created by Cheo Hodari Coker, ABC Television Studio/Disney-ABC Domestic Television/Marvel Entertainment/Marvel Television/Netflix/The Walt Disney Company/Walt Disney Television, 2016–2018.
- The L Word*. Created by Michele Abbott, Ilene Chaiken, and Kathy Greenberg, Anonymous Content/Dufferin Gate Productions/Showtime Networks/Viacom Productions, 2004–2009.
- The L Word: Generation Q*. Created by Michele Abbott, Ilene Chaiken, Kathy Greenberg, and Marja-Lewis Ryan, Showtime Networks, 2019–.
- Lyotard, Jean-François. The Postmodern Condition: A Report of Knowledge. Translated by Geoff Bennington and Brian Massumi, U of Minnesota P, 1984.
- Mad Men*. Created by Matthew Weiner, Lionsgate Television/Weiner Bros./AMC/U.R.O.K. Productions, 2007–2015.
- The Marvellous Mrs Maisel*. Created by Amy Sherman-Palladino, Amazon Studios/Dorothy Parker Drank Here Productions/Picrow, 2017–.
- Masters of Sex*. Created by Michelle Ashford, Round Two Productions/Sony Pictures Television/Timberman-Beverly Productions, 2013–2016.
- The Munsters*. Created by Ed Haas and Norm Liebmann, CBS/Kayro-Vue Productions, 1964–1966.
- Narcos*. Created by Carlo Bernard, Chris Brancato, Doug Miro, and Paul Eckstein, Dynamo/Gaumont International Television/Netflix, 2015–2017.
- Niemeyer, Katharina, editor. Media and Nostalgia: Yearning for the Past, Present and Future. Palgrave Macmillan, 2016.
- The 1900 House*. Channel Four Television Corporation/WNET Channel 13 New York/Wall to Wall Television, 1999–2000.
- One Day at a Time*. Created by Whitney Blake, Norman Lear and Allan Manings, Embassy Television/TAT Communications Company, 1975–1984.
- One Day at a Time*. Created by Gloria Calderon Kellett and Mike Royce, Act III Productions/Glo Nation/Snowpants Productions/Sony Pictures Television, 2017–.

- Outlander*. Created by Ronald D. Moore, Tall Ship Productions/Story Mining and Supply Co./Left Bank Pictures/Sony Pictures Television/Soundtrack New York, 2014–.
- Padva, Gilad. Queer Nostalgia in Cinema and Pop Culture. Palgrave Macmillan, 2014.
- Pan Am*. Created by Nancy Hult Ganis and Jack Orman, Shoe Money Productions/Jack Orman Productions/Out of the Blue ... Entertainment/Sony Pictures Television, 2011.
- Party of Five*. Created by Christopher Keyser and Amy Lippman, Columbia Pictures Television/Columbia TriStar Television/High Productions/Keyser/Lippman Productions, 1994–2000.
- Party of Five*. Created by Amy Lippman and Christopher Keyser, Sony Pictures Television, 2020–.
- Peaky Blinders*. Created by Steven Knight, Caryn Mandabach Productions/Tiger Aspect Productions/BBC, 2013–.
- Peeping Tom*. Directed by Michael Powell, Michael Powell (Theatre), 1960.
- “Person to Person.” Directed by Matthew Weiner, Mad Men, Season 7, Episode 14, 2015.
- Pickering, Michael, and Emily Keightly. The Mnemonic Imagination: Remembering as Creative Practice. Palgrave Macmillan, 2012.
- Proctor, William. “‘Bitches Ain’t Gonna Hunt No Ghosts’: Totemic Nostalgia, Toxic Fandom and the Ghostbusters Platonic.” Palabra Clave, vol. 20, no.4, Oct. 2017, pp. 1105–1141, DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5294/pacla.2017.20.4.10>.
- Psycho*. Directed by Alfred Hitchcock, Shamley Productions, 1960.
- Reynolds, Simon. Retromania: Pop Culture’s Addiction to Its Own Past. Faber and Faber, 2011.
- Riverdale*. Created by Roberto Aguirre-Sacasa, Berlanti Productions/Archie Comics Publications/CBS Television Studios/Warner Bros. Television/Canada Film Capital, 2017–.
- Roseanne*. Created by Roseanne Barr and Matt Williams, Wind Dancer Productions/Carsey-Werner Company/Paramount Television/Jax Media, 1988–2018.
- Roswell High*. Created by Jason Katims, Jason Katims Productions/Regency Television/Twentieth Century Fox Television, 1999–2002.
- Roswell, New Mexico*. Created by Carina Adly Mackenzie, Amblin Television/My So-Called Company/Bender Brown Productions/CBS Television Studios/Warner Bros. Television, 2019–.
- “San Junipero.” Directed by Owen Harris, Black Mirror, Season 3, Episode 4, 2016.

- Sabrina the Teenage Witch*. Created by Jonathon Schmock and Nell Scovell, Finishing the Hat/Hartbreak Films/Viacom Productions, 1996–2003.
- Scream: The TV Series*. Created by Jay Beattie, Jill E. Blotevogel, Dan Dworkin and Brett Matthews, DiGa Studios/Dimension Films/Dimension Television/Lantern Entertainment/MTV/Netflix, 2015–.
- Seymour, Richard. The Twittering Machine. Indigo Press, 2019.
- Storr, Will. Selfie: How We Became So Self-Obsessed and What It's Doing to Us. Picador, 2017.
- Stranger Things*. Created by Matt Duffer and Ross Duffer, 21 Laps Entertainment/Monkey Massacre/Netflix, 2016–.
- Terminator 2: Judgement Day*. Directed by James Cameron, Carolco Pictures/Pacific Western/Lightstorm Entertainment/Canal Plus/T2 Productions, 1991.
- 13 Reasons Why*. Created by Brian Yorkey, July Moon Productions/Kicked to the Curb Productions/Anonymous Content/Paramount Television, 2017–.
- Twin Peaks*. Created by Mark Frost and David Lynch, Lynch/Frost Productions/Propaganda Films/Spelling Entertainment/Twin Peaks Productions, 1990–1991.
- Twin Peaks: The Return*. Created by Mark Frost and David Lynch, Showtime Networks/Rancho Rosa Partnership/Twin Peaks Productions/Lynch/Frost Productions, 2017.
- Ugly Betty*. Created by Silvio Horta and Fernando Gaitán, Silent H Productions/Ventanarosa Productions/Reveille Productions/Touchstone Televisions/ABC Studios/Buena Vista Television/Walt Disney Television, 2006–2010.
- Westworld*. Created by Lisa Joy and Jonathon Nolan, Bad Robot/Jerry Weintraub Productions/Kilter Films/Warner Bros. Television, 2016–.
- When They See Us*. Created by Asante Blackk, Caleel Harris and Ethan Herisse, Forward Movement/Harpo Films/Participant/Tribeca Productions, 2019.
- Will and Grace*. Created by David Kohan and Max Mutchnick, KoMut Entertainment/Three Princesses and a P/Three Sisters Entertainment/NBC Studios/NBC Universal Television/Universal Television, 1998–.
- The X-Files*. Created by Chris Carter, Ten Thirteen Productions/Twentieth Century Fox Television/X-F Productions, 1993–2018.

Suggested Citation

Fradley, Martin. “Netflix Nostalgia: Screening the Past on Demand,” edited by Kathryn Pallister, and The Aesthetics of Nostalgia TV: Production Design and the Boomer Era, by Alex

Bevan.” Book review. Alphaville: Journal of Film and Screen Media, no. 19, 2020, pp. 230–241, DOI: <https://doi.org/10.33178/alpha.19.22>.

Martin Fradley has taught Film and Media Studies widely across the UK university sector. His recent work appears in the anthologies Tainted Love: Screening Sexual Perversion (2017), The Politics of Twin Peaks (2019), Make America Hate Again: Trump-Era Horror and the Politics of Fear (2019) and Media, Technology and New Generations: Representing Millennial Generation and Generation Z (forthcoming, 2020). He is coeditor of Shane Meadows: Critical Essays (Edinburgh UP, 2013) and author of Straight Outta Uttoxeter! The Films of Shane Meadows (forthcoming).