In the Hospital

Adam Fotos

Princess Diana is dead,

her Rolls Royce like a crumpled paper cup dipped in black enamel. The beetle-thing twinkles back the camera flashes and street lights as we watch from above through the lenses of angelic attendants the camera crew from CNN, and we read in the ICU from the TV above my grandfather's bed about her last game of polo.

My grandfather lies asleep and I don't think about the entourage of machines around him braiding his body with sensors and tubes buzzing intermittently, and I don't wonder why they would let us watch his blood filter in and out of a large grey box, through clear, plastic tubes.

I listen to my step-father whispering of the royal family and conspiracy.
