Police Of West Berlin Retaliate

By JOSEPH B. FLEMING
United Press International
BERLIN (UPI) — West Berlin police today began demanding identity papers of all Russians in civilian dress trying to enter the western sector of the city.

The action apparently was approved by the United States, Britain and France in retaliation against attempts by East German Communist police to restrict the movements of Allied officials in East Berlin.

Sand Company Is Purchased By Crouse

The silica sand mining operations of Murray Sand Company were taken over today by Crouse Corporation of Paducah, Ky., according to Taz Ezell, Murray Sand Company president. The transfer of operations was approved at a special meeting of the sand company's Board of Directors held in Paducah yesterday.

The communist newspaper did not tell its readers when the tanks were used, or that they were still hidden near the Friedrichstrasse checkpoint in a bombed-out ruin in East Berlin.

All Male Transy Students Printed

LEXINGTON, Ky. (UPI) — Police experts today began fingerprinting the 223 male students of Transylvania College in an effort to solve the slaying of a co-ed found strangled on campus early last Friday.

The body of 19-year-old Betty Gale Brown of Lexington, a language student and choir singer, was found strangled with her brassiere in her small foreign made car.

Richard Van Doring Dies Early Today

Richard Van Doring, age 70, died today at 3:55 a.m. at the Murray Hospital from complications resulting from an illness of two weeks.

Survivors include his wife Mrs. Violet Van Doring of Murray route five; a daughter Mrs. Kay Tush of Gary, Indiana; two sons Albert Van Doring of Murray route five and Richard Van Doring of Crown Point, Indiana.

Farewell For A Year

MAJOR WILLIAM E. DODSON bids temporary farewell to Dewey Lampkins Jr. who was recently appointed Manager of the Peoples Bank Consumer Loan Department.

Major Dodson was recently made Economic Officer of his unit and will head this section while in active service.

Goblins Storm City Last Night

The warm and mild weather brought in a rougher than usual Halloween last night with hoards of "trickers and treaters" out as well as pranksters.

Goblins of all sizes went from house to house last night raking in the goodies.

Fires burned fiercely in at least three different places in the county. A wagon filled with tires was set fire at the Harjira crossroad and burning logs were reported near Kirksey.

In spite of the large number groups moving over the town last night, actual vandalism apparently was small. The usual sooping of windows was carried out, but little damage was reported.

Aid For Worthy Students Is Recommended By Commission

FRANKFORT, Ky. (UPI) — The State Commission on Higher Education recommended to Gov. Bert T. Combs Tuesday that a program be established to provide scholarships for worthy students who wish to go to college and urged creation of a master state board for control of higher education.

The commission also urged creation of a state support system of junior colleges with their own independent governing boards.

Airliner Crashes With 85 On Board

RIO DE JANEIRO (UPI) — A Panair Do Brasil DC-7 airliner with 85 persons aboard, crashed and burned today during an attempted landing at Guararapes Airport in the northeastern Brazilian city of Recife.

The airline director here said he had informed only that the plane crashed and burned while trying to land at the Recife airfield.

Court Of Honor Is Held By Troop 77 On Monday

Boy Scout Troop 77 held a court of honor Monday night at the First Christian Church.

Following the invocation by W. B. Moser, presentations were made to scouts present.

Heiress Surprised At Grannie's Will

ERLENBACH, Switzerland (UPI) — Runaway heiress Gamble Benedict Porumbanu "could hardly believe" her feuding grandmother had left her $20 million, albeit with strings attached, her husband said today.

Andre Porumbanu, ex-chauffeur who eloped with the "poor little rich girl" last year, said he, too, was "surprised" at the bequest by Mrs. Katherine Geddes Benedict who died Sunday night in New York.

Services For Alva Walton Here Friday

Alva Walton, age 54, died Tuesday at 2:00 p. m. at a hospital in Detroit of complications.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Era McClain Walton, Hazel Park, Michigan; two daughters, Mrs. James Smith, Hazel Park, and Mrs. J. Galladora, New Orleans; two sons, Tommy and Glenn Walton, both of Hazel Park, and one brother, Owen Walton.

Success, whose education can be promoted and assured only through such means.

These funds should be carefully administered in the best interests of the individual and society. More young people would be encouraged to start their own programs of higher education, and many might later be able to

to continue under their own financing."

The report added, "Whatever the cost of higher education, the price must be paid if democracy is to survive. Because of the lack of correlation of intelligence and financial ability of the individual, pay for education, the financing of education becomes the responsibility of society.

"Geographic inequities in the distribution of wealth may throw this responsibility to the state and even the nation.

and in the high Rockies and rain fell in parts of the upper Great Lakes and Atlantic Coast areas.

More warm weather was the story in the Southeast, where some areas in Georgia now have gone 46 days without rain. Atlanta had a record high of 89 degrees Tuesday. Four degrees higher than the previous record for Oct. 31 set in 1950.

The drought also was setting other records in Georgia. A Weather Bureau spokesman in Atlanta said, "We haven't had time to go all the way through the records for comparisons, but it looks like this one is the worst of them all."

High Waistline Has Added Support In Fashion Previews

By GAY PAULEY
United Press International
NEW YORK (UPI) — The high waistline silhouette for spring gets added supporters as more manufacturers preview their collections for the next fashion season.

Latest to join the ranks is Larry Aldrich, whose chief designer, Marie McCarthy, featured the above-the-normal waistline in both daytime and evening clothes.

"The raised waistline in varying degrees is important for spring," said Aldrich as he showed his collection late Wednesday.

Wide Fabric Insets
Aldrich's designer defined the new waistline with wide insets of fabric through the midriff, with seaming or bands of fabric under the bosom, with jackets closing at the bust instead of at the waist, or with vertical darts sewn from the hem of brief jackets to shape them to the mid-section of the body.

Aldrich showed normal waistlines too—many of them belted tightly in black patent.

The Aldrich collection also added emphasis to the soft look which promises to take over by spring. Floating chiffons are replacing the stiffened sils of past seasons, the bias cut abounds in all pace-setting collections, and gathers, flares and pleats soften the harsher straight-lined silhouette of recent years.

Soft Suit Spring
"We predict it will be a soft suit spring," said Aldrich. Typical of the soft suits at this firm was a group whose skirts looked slim when the models stood still. But the skirts swung gracefully when the models walked because of all-around gathers at the waist, or flat-pressed pleats at the sides. Sleeveless chiffon blouse tops added to the soft look.

Chiffon was the predominant fabric at Rudolf Gowas, a firm specializing in cocktail and evening fashions. Sheath dresses in chiffon came with rippling cape backs. Several slender chiffon dresses had row on row of ruffles.

Hypochondria May Be Signal Of Disease

An expert has come to the front with a medical defense of the hypochondriac—the person who seems excessively concerned with personal health and who complains of a variety of vague discomforts for which no apparent cause can be found.

According to Dr. H. P. Greenberg of Sydney, Australia, the symptoms of hypochondria may be "precursors and concomitants of mental illness of all degrees of severity."

Dr. Greenberg outlined four main stages of hypochondriasis, which do not necessarily follow a set order in each patient. One stage is that in which the complaints do not appear to be medically important, such as not feeling quite "right" or perhaps a slight indigestion, depression or difficulty in sleeping normally.

Another stage is that in which the symptoms are more localized and specific, such as a crawling sensation on the skin, or the throat feeling tight or blocked.

In stage three, the patient may become convinced that he has tuberculosis, or cancer, and begin making the rounds of doctors attempting to find one who will agree with him. During this phase, Dr. Greenberg reports, the patient is likely to become overburdened with fears and show a high degree of irritability.

The most severe stage is when the hypochondriac becomes convinced that he is being persecuted, perhaps that someone is attempting to poison him, or that evil cosmic radiations are responsible for his illness.

While some of the disturbances involved in each of these four stages of hypochondriasis are associated with known disease processes, and can be treated successfully either through medicine or psychiatry, the overall mechanism is not yet understood, Dr. Greenberg stated.

The word hypochondriac comes from hypochondrium, which designates the area on either side of the abdomen between the bottom rib and navel. Over the centuries, mankind complained so persistently of discomfort in these areas that the vague disturbances were finally given the medical name of hypochondriasis. Galen, the Greek physician recorded in the 2nd century A.D. his belief that the condition was due to bile, and somehow responsible for melancholia. Early French doctors called it "the disease without a disease."

By 1900, the medical profession had agreed that hypochondriasis was a mental problem, and today it is generally regarded as a symptom of a neurotic personality. Dr. Greenberg would have the medical profession accept manifestations of hypochondria as a definition of the need for medical attention. He and other investigators are beginning to ponder a suggestion made by Sigmund Freud that hypochondriasis might be due to some interference with normal body chemistry which causes the body to "poison" itself.

Since so many of today's medical advances consist of altering the chemistry of the body, it is possible that hypochondriasis will be found to result from chemical imbalances. In the meantime, the so-called hypochondriac may have good reason to be concerned about his health.

Lion In The Hills
 By JOHN B. PRESCOTT

CHAPTER 1
 AT DAWN a flimsy tatter of gray cloud hung over the Mogollon Rim—the sheer rise of cliff that lay northerly of the rickety table in the basin. But it soon raveled off, and by the time they'd worked their way up into the middle in the morning had turned off as clear and bright as you'd want.

"Not that we don't need rain," Sam Fellows said as he urged his mule up the last of the grade. "But there wasn't any hope in that skimpy thing. Can't look for much before July, anyway."

They halted there now beside a piñon tree that bore the budding fruit of the early season; the old man named Sam Fellows on the white mule and Alec Temple, who was fifteen and rode the steady bay mare.

They sat there a spell, resting the mounts and themselves and listening for the bounds. Having climbed from the saddle below the saddle—a pocket that trapped sound—they should hear them now, Alec thought. But even on this height, the early quiet still held. Nothing much sounded but the rub of leather, the breathing of their animals and the secret rustle of small creatures in nearby trees. All else was silent.

He sat as still as he could and stared off over the pitch and fall of red hills, the wooded ridges and dry grass. Beyond him, Sam said, the windward, listening, while the sun gloved in his wreath of white beard. Just before him, the long mane of Jock, the mule, turned and swayed in their sockets as if he, too, listened.

And maybe he did, Alec thought. To hear Sam speak was smarter on the trail than any horse, and wiser than any man. Some men, anyway.

It wasn't so "easy to tell about Sam, however—at least, not so soon. Alec had known him only two months, and Sam's eyes often crinkled up at the edges when he spoke of certain things or spoke of them in a certain way. At times, it made you wonder how he really meant them, and more than once it made Alec very much aware of being a tenderfoot—a dude; they called them out here.

Not that Sam had ever used the awful word in his hearing. He could think it, however. Alec took a breath and let it out slowly. Then, as he was still unused to the bulk and fit of Western saddles, he squirmed around some. The race had gone an hour or better so far, and he could feel his back growing stiff; the rigging creaked his legs, too. Riding in the Arizona wilderness was turning out to be different than on a bridle path in a park in Washington, D.C. It was his first time after lion, too, and it was hard to be as patient as Sam was about this writing. "Can you hear them yet?" he asked the hunter.

A part of a minute passed before Sam answered. He never seemed to hurry much over anything. Then he said, "Kind of." while his faded blue eyes smiled.

They were quiet again for a time. Alec found himself wishing again that Claude, his father, had been able to join them on the hunt. Then a little cloud edged the thought, and his mind returned to the moment of leaving the cabin that morning.

All along, Claude had said that he planned to join them, but with the time to go at hand, he'd changed his mind.

"I'm sorry, Alec," he'd said as he began to clear the table of breakfast dishes. "But I'd better pass it up this time."

Alec, still eating, glanced up in surprise when they'd turned in. "But you said you'd come. Dad. We've been counting on it."

"I have, too, son. But I just can't take the time."

Last evening, when they'd turned in, all had been settled. Now it wasn't, and Alec was reminded of the many other times when things planned together had been interfered with at the last moment.

"I'll apologize to Sam," Claude said. "But I've got that grazing board meeting tomorrow, and I want to study last year's allotments."

"Couldn't you look at them tonight, when we get back?" "Well, yes, I suppose so, but I want to ride out to Chaparral Tank, too, to see if the runoff is filling it."

"What about the assistant rangers? Pete Ahern or Harvey Bald?"

Claude laughed, putting the brand away. "Oh, I could send one of them, all right. But I'll feel better going myself. Then I'll know."

Alec might have expected that answer, for Claude seldom asked for help in work he could do himself. And if it happened to be no work on hand at any moment, he often looked for some. It had been his way as far back as Alec remembered—at least, as far back as their sad return from Japan and Korea eight years before.

But now was no time to think of that; Sam was speaking, and his hand raised, as if to hold all of nature quiet.

"There it is! It's them, all right. He's running now!"

Alec wasn't sure about the baying at first, but it grew and soon became a liquid belling that ran and flowed across the rolling country beyond.

Still, in some ways it wasn't so different from when Sam had put them on the lion's sign beside the ruins of the dead steer at daybreak back on Fred.

This story is fiction. Any similarities in names, characters or incidents to actual persons or events are unintentional.

and Mildred McMahon's range. "How do you know they've found the lion?" he asked.

"The baying," Sam said. "It changes. You might think so on hearing it the first time. But it does. With Jupiter you'd know."

Jupiter, Sam's best strikehound, was an elderly redbone left behind at Sam's cabin, his trailing days rationed. But Sam declared his voice to be a thing of marvel, still, old age or not.

"Hear it now?" Sam said. "The sound is higher and not so broken. That means they're chasing him, looking at him, not just wondering. Let's ride; the trail is hot now."

THE BAYING seemed to come more from the right than earlier—closer to the cliffs.

Sam had said that a lion in flight would head for high country from instinct. And, as that seemed to be the case now, Alec rode the pack would put it up a tree before it reached the rim and took safety in the close rocks. Should it reach the walls at a point that had no canyon nearby for the dogs and mounts to follow up and strike the trail again, up on top, the lion would go free.

But, then, Sam had said, too, that lions weren't much for distance. When hunted, they might run, but, unlike, they'd soon make for height—a lone point of rock, some handy tree, whatever might bear them above their tormentors. They didn't seem to think far beyond the immediate threat.

Alec's thoughts turned again to Claude, who no doubt would only now be arriving at the Ranger Station; though, having been up earlier than usual, he might have gone down sooner than his regular time. As District Ranger, and still a new man on the Coconino National Forest, he often did so.

For a moment, while his mind lingered on Claude, Alec felt the weight of disappointment again. But, then, perhaps he'd asked too much. Back in Washington, where they'd gone directly from the Orient, Alec had grown used to Claude's devotion to his work in National Forest Headquarters; but after eight years, when transfer orders had come, he'd let himself believe that out here in the West there would be more time and they could even be together more often. It was still the same, however. In fact, Claude worked even harder now that he was in the field again. As if hidden by some influence or force hidden to Alec's knowledge or sight, Claude seemed content only when deeply involved in forest affairs. Likely, Alec began to think now, it was best to stay off from bothering him.
