EDITORIAL

An institution which exists a century after its establishment is entitled to celebrate. If the institution can look with pride at its past, and with respect at its present, and with confidence toward its future, it has additional reasons for rejoicing.

The Dickinson School of Law is such an institution. The annals of its history are rich with records of service and bright with the inspiration of great names. In the midst of national cataclysmic and economic disasters, its numbers, resources, and its prestige remain unimpaired. There are on the horizon of its future no clouds of discouragement or doubt.

To Dickinsonians everywhere it pleases me to give the assurance that the Law School is a happy family living in a well appointed house. It is a household of splendid ancestry and fine traditions. It has worthy ambitions and diligence and industry. It has as firm a faith for its future as it has respect for its past.

As the head of the house I am proud of it, and I hope that it thinks not unkindly of me.

W. H. HITCHLER.
