Abstract

Therapists seeing refugee populations often struggle with the traditional boundaries of psychotherapy and conventional wisdom's about therapeutic goals and practice. The social, political and cultural context of the therapeutic work throws up dilemmas and constraints that need to be better understood in working with these marginalized clients, particularly those in unconfined environments such as South Africa. Although many refugees experience serious mental health problems and adjustment difficulties, the context in which treatment is offered impacts on the type of psychotherapeutic intervention and therapist stance that is optimal or possible. This study discusses presenting strengths, dilemmas and possible guiding therapeutic principles that arose from in-depth semi-structured interviews with 8 interviewees (4 psychotherapists and 4 refugee clients) concerning their experiences of conducting and being in medium term psychotherapy, looking at similarities and differences in observations. In accordance with the literature, this study found that the main descriptions of psychological distress discussed by the refugee clients included those caused by past trauma and those that were a response to current experiences. The prevalence of these symptoms stresses the importance of psychological intervention. The strengths of psychotherapy noted by refugee clients included: the preparation for psychotherapy through psycho-social workshops, attaining of both emotional and general support, the psych-social approach used by many of the therapists and the importance of foundational elements of psychotherapy, such as the relationship. This research project found that experiencing a containing therapeutic space was possible due to what refugees coined 'the professionalism of the therapists'. Therapists raised such issues such as having to step out of the conventional therapist role, having to deal with the impact of the horror stories described by refugees, struggles to identify appropriate therapeutic approaches, difficulties in assisting refugees to establish sustainable support networks and not meeting refugees' expectations that they will be 'fully healed' through therapy. Possible guiding therapeutic principles, such as working within the supportive framework of a two phased integrative framework, are also discussed. The study found that ideally speaking, therapists and refugee clients are more supported if therapy is offered as part of a multi-dimensional and multidisciplinary approach.

Acknowledgements

This research project would not have been possible without the support of several people. I would like to thank the following people for their direct and indirect contributions towards this research project:

- ❖ Professor Gill Eagle, my supervisor. Your generosity in sharing your insight on many levels, your wisdom, knowledge and teaching has been invaluable. Your strength, openness, passion for psychology in her greater sense, dedication to your work as supervisor, despite unforeseen challenges have left me touched and inspired. I am grateful for the experience.
- ❖ The refugee clients and therapists who volunteered for this study. Without their input, experiences and stories this research project would not have been possible. Thank you for sharing with me. My hope is that this project can contribute to, and enhance other refugee clients and therapists experiences in this context in the future.
- ❖ The Centre for Violence and Reconciliation (CSVr) for supporting me by allowing me to put up posters to recruit both therapists and refugees. More specifically: Marevik for your guidance in helping me put together a practically viable methodology, Francis for your support and patience in my continuous phone calls; and Megan for helping me put up posters and your encouragement throughout my journey.
- ❖ Ingrid for your inspiring and thought provoking thoughts and editing.
- ❖ Jan-Geu, Frederique and Floor for your emotional and material support and your belief in me despite my long and bumpy academic journey. You have made my journey possible. I have now finally arrived and a new chapter is unfolding.
- ❖ My friends, for your steady cheering and encouragement from the sidelines.
- ❖ Eric for your support and level headedness, your love and perseverance in the last two life changing years. You are my rock.
