INTRODUCTION

This resource guide comprises manuscript division collection and digital objects related to medicine. The resources of the manuscript division are collections that were donated to Howard University and they provide relevant information about the personal and professional lives of distinguished African American physicians, politicians, and educators.

The digital objects are diverse in their contents. However, they most importantly consist of research papers, case reports, and articles related to Howard University School of Medicine and School of Dentistry

Preserving The Legacy of the Black Experience The Moorland-Spingarn Research Center

Since early in its formative years, Howard University has collected materials related to people of African descent. Established in 1973 as a separate administrative unit, the Moorland- Spingarn Research Center continues to maintain that tradition of service. Moorland is recognized as one of the world's largest and most comprehensive repositories for the documentation of the history and culture of Black people in the diaspora. As one of the University's major research facilities, the center collects, preserves, organizes, and makes available for research a wide range of resources chronicling the Black experience.

The Center is named for Dr. Jesse E. Moorland and Arthur B. Spingarn, two benefactors whose collections provided the foundation for later development. Following the re-organizing of the collections as the Moorland-Spingarn Research Center in 1973, separate Library and Manuscript Divisions were established, followed by the creation of the Howard University Museum in 1979 and the Howard University Archives in 1980.

While the Library Division expands the Center's extensive collection of books, newspapers, journals, and printed materials, the other units are an integral part of the Center's program to redefine approaches to documentation and research into the complexities of Black history and culture. MSRC's combined resources emphasize the identification, acquisition, preservation, research, and exhibition of both primary and secondary material which transforms the existing special collections into one of the world's premier research facilities.
