WOU Community Health + Polk County COVID-19 Project: Campus-Community Partnership to Prevent Disease and Promote Community Well-Being During a Global Pandemic.

The WOU Community Health + Polk County COVID-19 project is a local example of how Academic Health Departments can serve as public health training sites for students of public health as well as address the public health needs of the local community. An academic health department (AHD), represents a formal affiliation between an academic institution and a public health practice organization, such as a local health department. The WOU Community Health + Polk County COVID-19 project team consists of WOU faculty in Community Health, recent alumni, undergraduate students and Polk County Public Health staff. This session will review the outcomes, challenges and lessons learned during the first year of a health communication and contact tracing intervention in Polk County, Oregon. How can undergraduate students, faculty and community partners build a network for student success and community well-being? We share our publicly available health communication campaign materials, as well as discuss students' perspectives on professional development and networking opportunities within the project.
