Dear Sir,

Ph.D. Ordinance.

Department of Theology.

I beg to hand you herewith a Thesis, entitled "Yoruba Paganism, or the Religious Beliefs of the West African Negroes, particularly of the Yoruba Races of Southern Nigeria", embodying the result of the course of study to which I was admitted by the Senatus in 1922, and I request that you will kindly submit this in due course to the Board of Theological Studies and to the Senatus, with my request for the granting of the Degree. I enclose the required Fee of Ten Guineas (£10:10:0).

In presenting the Thesis as a distinct contribution to the advancement of learning, I beg to submit that, -

- (1) The thesis contains a considerable amount of information never before published in this country or elsewhere, being the outcome of my personal investigations.
- (2) It co-ordinates and combines information gathered from divers/divers sources, dealing with various branches of the subject, much of this being difficult of access, having never been published in this country, and some only in the Yoruba language.

(3) It is (to the best of my knowledge) the first and only systematic treatise devoted entirely to the Religion of the Yorubas and seeking to give at least some account of each aspect of the subject.

I beg to add that the Thesis is entirely my own unaided work, except that I have acted under the guidance of Professor Paterson, to whom I am much indebted for valuable suggestions as to books to be consulted and as to aspects of the subject to be dealt with in certain chapters.

The personal investigations made when living in West Africa have been supplemented and systematized during the past two years by my researches in the University Library and the Advocates' Library in this city, and in the Reading Room of the British Museum, London, and by correspondence and conversations with natives of the Yoruba country.

I apologize for the many corrections of typists' errors, and for any such as may have been overlooked.

I am,

Yours faithfully,

Stephen S. Farrow.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

The purpose of this treatise is to give some account of the religious beliefs and practices of the West African Negroes, particularly as exhibited by the tribes of the Yoruba country in Southern Nigeria, contributing somewhat to the study of the History of Religion, and also, while recognizing the elements of truth already possessed by the said people, justifying the propagation of Christianity among them.

Something has already been done in this particular field, but the chief works have been written by those who were not conversant with the language, and who, with the exception of the late Mr R.E.Dennett, did not live among the people. These writers had to get their information at second or third hand, and their work, praiseworthy as it is for the pains taken in acquiring the same, and valuable for what it has recorded, has suffered considerably from the serious difficulties which beset research of this kind. Dr E.B.Tylor pointedly says "Even with much time and care and knowledge of language, it is not always easy to elicit from savages the details of their theology. They try to hide from the prying and contemptuous foreigner their worship of gods who seem to shrink, like their worshippers, before the white man and his superior Deity." ¹ Dr Andrew Lang well says "Your testimony is often derived from observers ignorant of the language of the people whom they talk about, or who are themselves influenced by one or other theory, or bias.... The savage informants wish to please or to mystify inquirers, or they answer at random, or deliberately conceal their most sacred institutions, or have never paid any attention to the subject." ² The two sources of error, "the desire to please" and "the desire to mystify", are ever present in the mind of the West African pagan who is being interrogated by the white man. Also the Yoruba language is one of peculiar subtlety. Its most important feature is musical intonation, and a frequent method of deceit is to utter the words of one sentence and to put upon them the tones of another, conveying a totally different meaning, which only a person with an expert knowledge of the language can detect. Lying is so common that when a falsehood is detected, the culprit excuses himself by saying "Did you not know that I was talking Yoruba?"

² The Making of Religion, p.45.

Dr R.H.Nassau, writing after forty years' experience in the French Congo, gives us his method,- "Wherever I lived I was always leading the conversation, in hut or in camp, back to a study of native thought. I soon found that I gained nothing, if I put my questions suddenly, or without mask. The natives generally were aware that white men despised them and their beliefs and were slow to admit me to their thought if I made a direct advance." He says also "Offering in the following pages a foundation of African superstitious beliefs and practices, I premise that I have gathered them from a very large number of native witnesses, very few of whom presented to me all the same ideas. Any one else, inquiring of other natives in other places, would not find, as held by every one of them, all that I have recorded; but parts of all these separate ideas will be found held by separate individuals everywhere." The writer's own experience fully coincides with that of this eminent authority, and his own enquiries were often of necessity circumlocutory and indirect. Valuable and reliable information was obtained for him by Mr (now the Rev.) J.J.Olumide, Mr E.S.Aiyebiwo, and other native Christian converts, from the devotees of special gods, who were their own relatives, or otherwise well known to them.

Another difficulty, necessitating caution and judgement in the acceptance of information, is that, in the absence of any written language, the standard of belief concerning various deities and powers varies considerably, even in a comparatively small area. Those cults in which the standard of belief is most carefully guarded are all connected with Secret Societies. These organizations wield enormous power over the whole of West Africa and are all of a religious or semi-religious nature. The initiated alone are allowed to know the doctrine and witness the rites of each, the penalty for revealing which is death. It would not for a moment be tolerated that any white man, or even uninitiated native, should witness, still less photograph, such ceremonies as might at all correspond to the "Churinga", "Intichiuma" and "Initiation Ceremonies" of the Central Australian tribes as described in Messrs Spencer and Gillen's works.

Religion is intimately associated with every detail of the life of the West African Negro, in its personal, social and political aspects. From birth to burial, and even beyond, his whole personal experience is regulated and controlled by his religion. The system of government is likewise entirely religious. The king is a sacred person. The senate is the Ogboni secret society. The executive is Oro, the avenging deity, which is represented by another secret society.

5a

MOSQUE AT KEMTA - ABEOKUTA

There are three great religions found in West Africa generally, viz:- Paganism, mainly of an animistic type, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. The two latter are foreign introductions, and do not come within the scope of this treatise, which deals only with the first, the indigenous belief of the Yoruba tribes, except in so far as to show finally the justification of Christian missionary work among these people.

The two writers who have dealt particularly with the religion of the Yoruba tribes are the late Col. Ellis, and the late Mr. R.E. Dennett. To each of these praise is due for the labour exercised and the amount of information given, but the work of each has suffered from the causes given above. The earlier writer, Col. Ellis, although he gives many Yoruba words and draws up a comparative table of the Yoruba, Ga, and Ewe languages, was evidently not thoroughly conversant with Yoruba. He calls the god of small-pox "Shankpanna", whereas the correct spelling is Şoppono. There are no closed syllables in the Yoruba language. The only apparent exception is a syllable ending in "n", which is merely a nasal intonation (cf. Fr. On).

Again, writing of tree-spirits, Ellis describes the iroko as the "silk-cotton tree". No one familiar with the country and its language could have made this mistake. The iroko is the "African oak". The Yoruba name for the silk-cotton tree is peregun. Moreover, Ellis gives no authorities for his statements, which are sometimes clearly incorrect; e.g., in his Yoruba-speaking Peoples he states (on p. 27) that "in January 1891, there was a great political meeting in Abeokuta, when some European missionaries were expelled." This is untrue, as regards the latter statement. The writer was living in Abeokuta at the time the said meeting was held. Its raison d'être was a dispute between the chiefs and the British government in Lagos. It was suggested by some that the missionaries should be expelled (as all Europeans had been on a similar occasion in 1867); but this suggestion was not adopted. None were expelled.

It is, unfortunately, not possible to exonerate the gallant colonel from a measure of anti-Christian bias, which at times leads him to jump to conclusions which are scientifically untrue, as in his treatment of the Yoruba conception of Olurun, the supreme Deity, as shown in a later chapter.¹

Mr Dennett was intimately known to the writer, whose wife was first cousin to this gentleman. Mr Dennett never learned to speak the language; but wrote down Yoruba words as given to him by others. As he went openly to priests and keepers of shrines and asked direct questions, this thoroughly British and un-African method of enquiry was very likely, indeed certain at times, to lead to imperfect, and, not seldom, untrue answers. Mr Dennett's interpretations, deductions and conclusions are often at fault, owing to his poor acquaintance with the language, and also to the very free play he gave to his imagination. This is very prominent in his pamphlet My Yoruba Alphabet.

The writer gratefully acknowledges his indebtedness to these two deceased authors and regrets the necessity of these criticisms, which, however, have to be made, since they are both quoted as authorities in such eminent works as Frazer's Golden Bough, Jevons' Introduction to the History of Religion, the Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics etc. It has also to be remembered that Dennett and Miss Kingsley alike borrow from Ellis and are influenced to some extent by his ideas.

The writer's personal investigations in the country were made during the years 1889 - 1894, before the study of the History of Religion had come into its present prominence, and before the country had been taken over by the British government, which during the last thirty years has put down with a strong hand human sacrifice and twin-murder. For many years prior to 1893 there were no Europeans or Americans in the interior of the Yoruba country, except a handful of missionaries.

THE YORUBA COUNTRY AND ITS PEOPLES. The Yoruba country is that portion of Southern Nigeria which is bounded on the west by the country of Dahomey, on the east by the sixth degree of east longitude, on the north by the high table-land through which flows the river Niger, and on the south by the Bight of Benin.

The population exceeds 3,000,000, and comprises the following tribes;- Yoruba proper, Egba, Lagos, Ketu, Jebu,¹ Ekiti, Ibadan, Ijesha, Ife, and Ondo. The Benin people are also closely allied to the Yoruba tribes, and their language may be regarded as its most remote dialect.

The writer lived for three years among the Egbas in Abeokuta, and for shorter periods among the Ibadans and in Lagos. He has visited other Yoruba tribes.

There is no authentic history of the Yoruba people until within the last two centuries or so. There are, however, many traditions as to their origin, the majority pointing to their being of foreign extraction, while a few regard them as an indigenous race, taking its rise at Ifè, which is still regarded as a place of the greatest sanctity by all the Yoruba tribes. Some of the traditions trace their origin to a great flood which destroyed all the world except one person (or more), a bird and a palm-nut, from which the Yorubas and the rest of the renewed world (human and otherwise) sprang.¹ The bulk of traditional testimony is in favour of their having immigrated from the north-east. There are strongly Semitic traits in their customs and idioms. Their folklore is rich in fables. Their speech is enriched with an abundance of proverbs, most of which show great astuteness and sound wisdom.

The several Yoruba tribes vary considerably in their degrees of civilization, and show much evidence of degeneration; but they are still the leading people in West Africa, in intelligence, in agriculture, in commerce and in military ability. The West Africa Frontier Force, (the finest British-trained African troops) is composed almost entirely of Yorubas. They are skilful in the primitive arts, smelting their own ore, making steel tools, growing their own cotton, spinning, dyeing and weaving it into cloth. Chip-carving, poker-work and leather-work are practised by them for decorative purposes.

At the beginning of the 18th century, all the tribes of the country were united under the king of old Oyo (i.e. Katunga) and the Yoruba kingdom was far more powerful than either Dahomey or Ashanti. In the days of Ajagbo there were four main divisions, viz:- Yoruba, Egba, Ketu and Jebu. The latter part of the said century was occupied by the long, peaceful and prosperous reign of Abiodun, who was succeeded in 1800 by Arogangan, during whose reign began the breaking up into various small tribes, with consequent inter-tribal wars, which were fostered for the purpose of maintaining the slave trade. The great town of Abeokuta was gradually formed between the years 1825 and 1838, by refugees from slave-raided towns, until definitely founded by Lishabi, who is described as a giant and a demi-god.

The most superior tribes are the Yoruba proper and the Egba; next come the Ibadans and the Jebus, then the Ijeshas and Ondos, and, last of all, the Binis, or Benin people. These last three have been the most degraded in devil-worship, twin-murder and human sacrifice.

THE YORUBA LANGUAGE. The language is of a simple agglutinating type. All its syllables are open, the only apparent exception being a nasal sound represented in type by the letter "n". Great use is made of tones. Three are recognised, viz: "high", "middle" and "low", e.g., fò - "to break", fó - "to speak", fò - "to wash". Many Europeans never learn to hear or speak with any accuracy, because they ignore this vital characteristic.¹

Three double consonants are used, viz: - ş for "sh",

¹. Dennett, in his Nigerian Studies, p. 66, gives seven different meanings to the word which he prints as "Okó", as though all were pronounced the same. As a matter of fact they are all pronounced differently, being from various roots, and should be given thus: - òkò, okò, òkóbó, okó, okò, òkò, - his other words similarly.

gb, a sound difficult to produce, and with no English equivalent, and p, pronounced as "kp". There is no pure "p" in Yoruba. Special vowels are e, short as in "met", and o, a short broad "a" as in "awe". The other vowels a, e, i, o, u, are pronounced according to the "continental" method, ah, eh, ee, ō, ōō.

CHAPTER II.

OBJECTS OF WORSHIP.

Man's communications with the external are through his senses, and the majority of our mental concepts are derived from the sense of sight. "Visual ideas" are formed, which in the religious sphere are generally expressed, especially in the more primitive religions, under visible forms, e.g., images, pictures, sacred objects (whether natural or of human formation), places etc. The regard, veneration, or worship, paid to these has been called "fetichism", "idolatry", "polytheism" etc.; but the worshippers always indignantly repudiate the suggestion that they adore the image, stock, stone, etc., as such, asserting that their worship is given to that spirit, or power, of which the material object is the representation, or the temporary abode. "A South African negro offered food to a tree in the presence of an European traveller. The latter observed that a tree cannot eat. 'Oh!', replied the negro, 'tree not fetich. Fetich spirit, not seen, live in tree!'"¹.

To get at the belief of such people as the Yoruba

tribes, we must, then, consider first the objects which represent that belief, and to which (outwardly at least) it is expressed in worship.

Professor D. G. Brinton, of Philadelphia, classifies the Objects of Worship in the following order:- the Celestial Bodies, the Four Elements, Stones and Rocks, Trees and Plants, Places and Sites, the Lower Animals, Man, Life and its Transmissions. This classification is necessarily materialistic, dealing with the external things of religion, but we will follow its order and consider later the Spiritual Beings which are represented by and worshipped through these.

The Celestial Bodies. There is among the Yorubas no existing worship of the sun, moon or stars; but traces of such in the past may be found. Orun (the sun) and Oshu (the moon) seem to have been deified, but sacrifices are no longer made to them. The appearance of the new moon, however, is observed as a festival, particularly when the new yams are in season.

The Four Elements. Neither earth, air, fire or water is sacred in itself. The worship of the wind is, however, found in Oye, the goddess of the Harmattan, a dry sirocco wind which blows from the north, at a certain season of the year, bringing a very fine dust from the Sahara. She is supposed to reside in a cave to the north of Ilorin, or on Igbeti, a mountain where Elegba (the devil) is said to have his palace. Possibly also in Olori Merin, the four-headed image which is found outside a town, facing the four quarters from whence come the winds, to keep away pestilence and damage by tornado, we have a survival of wind worship. This figure is really a "fetich" or "juju", not in itself an orisha, but representing the four great orishas, Obatala, Odudua, Shango and Ifa. Fire-worship may be traced in the cult of Shango, his priests claiming the right to act as salvage men (for their own benefit exclusively!) when a house is destroyed by fire. Also, when a candidate for the priesthood of Ifa (the chief oracle) is initiated, there is the ceremony of Pinḡu, in which he receives on the open palms of his hands (previously dipped in consecrated Ifa water) flaming oil from a new lamp, and rubs the same on his body, without experiencing injury, as a proof that he is secure against the fire of sickness and other "ills that flesh is heir to". In the same initiation there are water-ceremonies for purification, but water-worship is chiefly represented by the deities Olokun, the sea-god, Oloṣa, the lagoon-god, Oya, Oshun, Oba, goddesses of the three rivers bearing the same names, and the great goddess Yemaja who presides over the river Ogun.

Stones and Rocks. These, when in any way curious or conspicuous, are liable to become objects of worship. A stone slab resting on a pillar of rock, or even of earth, or a boulder poised aloft will probably become an object of veneration. At Ifè (the traditional cradle of the Yoruba race and religion) there are a few remains of ancient masonry, of which the origin is entirely unknown. These, according to tribal myths, are the remains of certain gods, who took part in the work of creation and then turned to stone. These stones are worshipped. Mr R.E. Dennett has suggested that they are remains of two churches "made by some black mason, possibly one of those natives sent to the King of Portugal in the fifteenth century and educated by the Portuguese. He may have returned as a lay brother or even as a priest and found his way to Ifè." This interesting conjecture has, however, nothing to support it! The stones show no trace of cross, crucifix, or any other Christian symbol; nor is there any record or tradition of any form of Christianity in the

THE OLUMỌ ROCK - ABEOKUTA

Yoruba country proper before the Church Missionary Society's pioneer mission in 1843.² With these stones and the myth associated with them may be compared a somewhat similar instance described by Messrs Spencer and Gillen in their work The Northern Tribes of Central Australia. In the chapter on Initiation Ceremonies they tell of two mythical men who died on their Churinga,- "So they lay down on their Churinga and died and great stones arose to mark the spot".¹ In the Yoruba country great rocks standing in the midst of a plain are likewise deified. A notable instance of this is the Olumo, which stands in the centre of Abokuta, a great town of 200,000 inhabitants, with an encircling wall, fifteen miles in circumference. This great rock contains a spacious cave and other hiding-places where many refugees found a shelter in the days when the export slave trade was at its height, their own towns and villages having been destroyed by the Moham- medan raiders. The name Olumo (Oluwa mo o) signifies "the Lord built it" and indicates that the place was re- garded as a divine gift for their protection, but the rock itself soon became an object of worship and human sacrifices were offered to it. Thus "they worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator". Oké is the god of mountains, worshipped by all who live in mountainous or rocky country, because, if neglected, he is credited with sending landslips and avalanches to punish those who have been neglectful of his wants. Falling boulders are always his handiwork, a token that he is requiring an offering. Another possible cause of the worship of these great rocks is the fact that, as the evening gives place to night, a weird singing noise proceeds from them, attributable to "spirits". When new to the country the writer was informed by an older missionary that the sound proceeded from "a lizard dying among the rocks"; but he noticed that it only occurred after intense heat, and began two or three hours after sunset, whence he concluded that it was caused by friction as the rocks cooled down, but the animistic pagan is ignorant of the simplest laws of natural science and attributes all such effects to "spirits". A curious instance of the worship of rock and stone is that which is paid to his stone anvil by the Yoruba blacksmith, as the representative of his god Ògún, the deity of iron and war.

¹Op. cit. p.346.

²But see Note at end of Chap.III.

Trees and Plants. Certain trees are particularly

22a

A SILK-COTTON TREE BY THE RIVER OGUN

sacred. The silk-cotton tree (Yoruba peregún) is highly venerated throughout West Africa "from the Senegal to the Niger", probably because of its majestic appearance, for it is of little utility, the timber being soft, and its cotton possessing neither strength nor durability. This tree often grows to a stupendous height, approximating 300 feet, "far out-topping all other trees of the forest".¹

With its light-coloured bark covering an enormous trunk, bare for one third or more of its height, surmounted by a luxurious growth of branches and dark green foliage, it presents a beautiful and imposing appearance. Colonel Ellis tells us that

"Among the Ewe-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast (who are next-door neighbours of the Yorubas, - S.S.F.) the indwelling god of this giant of the forest goes by the name of Huntin. Trees in which he specially dwells, - for it is not every silk-cotton tree that he thus honours - are surrounded by a girdle of palm-leaves, and sacrifices of fowls, or occasionally of human beings, are fastened to the trunk or laid at the foot of the tree. A tree distinguished by a girdle of palm-leaves may not be cut down or injured in any way, and even silk-cotton trees which are not supposed to be animated by Huntin may not be felled unless the woodman first offers a sacrifice of fowls and palm-oil to purge himself from the proposed sacrilege. To omit the sacrifice is an offence which may be punished by death." ¹

The Yorubas worship also the African oak (Iroko), to which the sacrifice of a white chicken is offered each month. The Ayan tree, which has very hard timber, is sacred to Shango, the god of lightning, and from it the Shango-axe or club is always made. The African mahogany (Apá), the Akoko and Ekika are also sacred. Some species of palm are ~~also~~ sacred, and every sacred grove is guarded by a palm-frond being suspended across its entrance. Shrines are frequently dedicated at the foot of a sacred tree.

Places and Sites. As might be expected, many such are to be found in the Yoruba country. The most sacred place is the town of Ifé, some fifty miles to the east of Ibadan. There are various myths as to the origin of the Yoruba people and of mankind generally, several of which begin with the tradition of a deluge. But practically all regard Ifè as the birthplace of the race. There is, however, a firmly established tradition among the Yorubas that their ancestors came from a far off country in the north-east. The following is a typical tradition-

From a far country in the interior were sent fifteen persons, and with them came Okambi, - a sixteenth who was presented with a slave, a trumpeter, Okikin by name, a fowl, and a bundle tied up with a black cloth. Their journey brought them to an unknown country, where ~~there~~ was nothing but water. The trumpeter sounded an alarm, the bundle was opened and from it fell some earth and a palm-nut, which sank into the water and from it sprang up at once a tree with sixteen branches. The weary travellers climbed into it and rested until the morning. The trumpeter blew a fresh blast, whereupon the fowl started scratching in the earth, and the water was dried up over a great area. Okambi, Okinkin and the slave Letu came down from the tree; but Okambi would not allow the others to descend until they promised to pay him periodically 200 cowries as tribute. This all took place at Ifè, which is therefore regarded as the place of origin of the world and of the Yoruba tribes.

Ifè is also credited with being the place of origin of many of the gods, e.g., Ifà, the supreme oracle. Kusò again is sacred as the site of the deification of Shango. Lishabi's Rock is a cliff on the bank of the river Ogun, about midway between Lagos and Abeokuta, where Lishabi, a great hunter and warrior, and the reputed founder of Abeokuta, is said to have descended into the earth after suffering defeat at the hands of the Dahomians. Canoemen passing the spot often hail "Lishabi, Oh!" in salutation of this demi-god, and when the hail is echoed back by the cliff they say that Lishabi is answering them. The writer has often heard this done.

Groves, which occupy a large place in the worship of the Yorubas, and are sacred sites, are not themselves "objects of worship", although they may contain such. As a rule, admission to them is only granted to the initiated of the particular cult to which each is devoted.

Lower Animals. Throughout West Africa, from Gambia to the Congo, the Leopard is regarded with great veneration, possibly because of its deep cunning, its great strength and its absolute fearlessness; hence the proverb

"Akamo ekùn yio ni iyonu", i.e. "He who blockades a leopard will have trouble", the equivalent of "to beard a lion in his den". When a leopard is killed its face is covered with a cloth, because it is a king, and its pardon is asked. A similar custom has been found in some parts of Russia when a bear is slain. The Alafin of Oyo, who is the paramount king of the Yoruba tribes, is called "the Leopard", and is himself regarded as divine. One of the most powerful, and the most dreaded, of the secret societies of West Africa is the Leopard Society, which has its stronghold in the hinterland of Sierra Leone and the Sherbro country. Its members, called "human leopards", wore leopard skins, with sharp steel claws in the pads, wherewith they inflicted ghastly and fatal wounds on their human victims. The patas, or red monkey, (Yoruba lJimere) is worshipped as being itself an orisha; but not all species of monkey are sacred. The writer possessed one of this kind as a pet, which was sometimes reverently saluted by heathen people as "Oluwa mi", i.e. "My lord".

In the various creation myths a bird (of undefined species) always figures largely. The image of a bird is constantly found depicted in the country poker-work, etc.; but the writer has found no trace of a bird becoming an object of worship. The nearest approach to this is the measure of respect shown to the vulture and the turkey-buzzard. These loathsome birds are found in great numbers in the towns. They haunt trees in the market-places and waddle about the streets picking up all manner of refuse. They are bolder than city sparrows or domestic fowls. Since they devour the sacrifices placed in the streets for the idols, they are called "ẹiyẹ orisha", i.e. "birds of the orisha", and are never molested in any way.

Among the Yorubas no reptile is raised to the rank of a god, or orisha, although crocodiles are honoured as being the slaves of Ọlọsa, the lagoon-goddess. Colonel Ellis, in his Ewe-speaking Peoples, states that among those tribes "the crocodile is worshipped at Bageida, Porto Seguro, Savi, Porto Novo and Badagry" and that formerly "a numerous priesthood was set apart for their service".¹ Among the Ibo tribes of the Owẹri district (near neighbours of the Yorubas) the boa-constrictor is worshipped. On the 27th day of each month a white cock is offered to him, with cowries, palm-oil or palm-nuts, white cloth and kola-nuts. The sacrifice is deposited at cross-roads, away from the town. There is, however, no reptile worship among the Yorubas, except in the case of crocodiles belonging to Oloosa, the lagoon-goddess, as described in a later chapter.

Man. Man is never worshipped as man; but only as being indwelt by some divine spirit. The nearest approach to the worship of man qua man is in the worship of one's own head. Yoruba psychology teaches that each man possesses, or is indwelt by three spirits, viz:— Olori (the "Lord of the head"), Ipin Ijeun (the "Sharer of the Food") who dwells in the stomach, and Ipori, who dwells in the great toe. The first is worshipped, and sacrifices are offered to him. He is the "luck" of the man and brings him good fortune. Various orishas are men who have been deified after death, e.g. great kings, heroes and magicians. The worship of ancestors is also general.

There are certain instances of worship paid to human beings during their life-time, which are interesting and important, notably in the case of kings, and of twins.

All kings, such as the Alafin of Oyo, the Alaké of Abokuta, the Oni of Ifé, and the Awujale of Jebu Ode, are divine, and reverence amounting to worship (but not sacrifice) is paid to them in their life-time. Up to thirty years ago, the Alaké of Abeokuta never left his own compound, but the new Alaké who then came to the throne did so and paid a visit to the writer. He afterwards came to England and was received by King Edward VII. The face of the Awujale of Jèbu Ode was never seen, even by his own subjects. He always communicated with them through a screen. That the divinity residing in the king is something beyond his own personality is shown by the following custom. The Yoruba word for "to reign" is jéba, from jé, "to eat" and gbá, "a king". This^{is} due to the fact that when a new monarch is appointed he has to eat the heart of his predecessor, and to retain and worship, as long as he lives and reigns, the head of the same. At his own decease this head is buried with his body, and his own head detached and his heart extracted for his successor to do likewise. The king's crown and throne become sacred. In a paper on "Lagos, Abeokuta and the Alaké", read by Sir William MacGregor (Governor of Lagos), before the African Society, he writes "Among the Yorubas of West Africa...the king's crown is sacred and is supposed to be the shrine of a spirit, which has to be propitiated. When the King (Oni) of Ife visited Lagos some years ago, he had to sacrifice five sheep to his crown between Ibadan and Ife, a two days' journey on foot."¹ The Ashantis of the Gold Coast believe that "the throne or chair of a king or chief is inhabited by a spirit to which it is consecrated and to which sacrifices are offered"².

Twin children are sacred throughout the Yoruba country, but whereas in the Niger and Ondo districts (until checked by the British government) all such had to be sacrificed, in Abeokuta and Yoruba proper, such are, and for long have been, regarded as demi-gods, the mother herself paying them special honour while living, and, should one die, replacing it by a wooden image which must be carried about, washed etc., as though still living, and to which sacrifices of food must be offered. The mother herself receives congratulations from her neighbours, and presents as an offering to the wee deities.

Life and its Transmissions. Under this heading must be included a number of gods of a superior order, which are not represented by any of the former classes.

² Frazer, The Golden Bough, i. p. 364.

Chief among them are those which (traditionally) took part in the creation of man, those which concern themselves with his preservation and with the reproduction of the race, and some who injure or destroy the same. Such are Obatala ("King of whiteness"), an extremely good orisha; Oduduwa, his wife, and their offspring; e.g. Yemaja, Olokun, Ogún, and others, who cannot be traced back to any human origin, but seem to have been always accepted as unseen spiritual powers. Nearly all of these are represented by some visible object, or "idol", usually an image made of wood or earth, or some special piece of rock or stone, either in its natural rough condition, or artificially cut and polished. Many shrines are seen in the open streets of great towns, containing an image, sacred mound of earth, etc. Some of these are described and illustrated in the following chapters.

Having thus reviewed some of the many objects of worship, we are now in a position to consider the "spirits" which are believed to indwell, or lie behind them. These are described in the succeeding chapters, as the "Objects of Belief".

CHAPTER III.

THE OBJECTS OF BELIEF.- (A) THE SUPREME DEITY.

The writer, when living in the Yoruba country, found that the worship of the people showed a belief in spiritual beings of various types, falling properly into four distinct classes; viz:- (A) A Supreme Deity, Olurun by name,- (B) A large class of Lesser Gods, or Orisas, their number being variously stated as 201, or 401, by their babalawos, or priests; but probably comprizing over 600,- (C) The Spirits of the Dead (Ancestor-worship etc.),- (D) A supreme Spirit of Evil, Esu, i.e. the "Devil".

(A). The Supreme Deity,- OLORUN. Anthropologists are divided in opinion as to whether there is to be found in the religion of primitive races a belief in one Supreme Being, and whether, if found, such a conception is not merely that of a glorified ghost, or of a nature god who has "outgrown the deities of that class and come to occupy an isolated position."¹ Dr Andrew Lang has clearly shown that such a conception is found, and that this cannot have been evolved from sheer animism.²

We find among the Yorubas a belief in a Being called Olurun, whose position is unique in several respects, as will be shown. He is regarded, by pagans, Mohammedans and Christians alike, as the one Supreme Eternal Being, and that this is not due to Mohammedan or Christian influence is evident from the fact that such was the pagan belief before either of the latter religions came into the country, and this again is proved by the traditional stories of creation held by all classes of pagans, particularly those who never came under the influence of the foreign religions. And yet the late Col. Ellis, in his book The Yoruba-speaking Peoples, classes Olurun among the Orishas, and says "he is the deified firmament" and "merely a nature-god, the personally divine sky, and he only controls phenomena connected in the native mind with the roof of the world". To support his contention he gives fanciful and very inaccurate derivations to the divine titles Elede and Olodumare. Furthermore, he brings the following charge against "missionaries":-

"Just as the missionaries have caused Nyankupon, Nyonmo, and Mawu to be confused with the Jehovah of the Christians, by translating these names as 'God', so have they done with Olorun, whom they consider to be a survival from a primitive revelation, made to all mankind, in the childhood of the world."¹ The colonel tacitly admits that experienced religious teachers, of various nationalities (French, German and British), and Christian denominations, among Ashantis, Dahomians and Yorubas, etc., all agree in testifying to the existence of this belief. And yet all this weight of expert testimony he lightly ignores! He treats Olorun as having been to some extent superseded by Shango, the god of lightning. Mr Dennett, on the other hand, in his Nigerian Studies, while he likewise confounds Olorun with the Orishas, suggests that he is a development of Shango, otherwise called Jakuta! Against the opinion of these two writers, whom we must regretfully regard as superficial observers, we have the judgement and testimony of the late Bishops Crowther and James Johnson, and of Bishop Oluwole, all being Africans and thoughtful men of culture, and of the late Rev. Henry Townsend and Rev. J. Buckley Wood (each of whom lived and worked for over forty years among the Yorubas), and of scores of other missionaries, who have all recognized and testified to the fact that the Yorubas have a clear conception of the one Supreme Deity, whom they call Olórun.

Dr R. H. Nassau, after a lifelong experience among the Bantu tribes of the Gaboon and Ogowé districts of the French Congo, bears a similar testimony as to the existence of a corresponding belief among those peoples.¹ Professor D. G. Brinton, of Pennsylvania University, writes, "It has been abundantly shown that amid the tribes of the West Coast of Africa, to whose gods the term fetish, feitico, was first applied by the Portuguese, the recognition and worship of tribal and national divinities and even of a Supreme Being, ruler and creator of the world, are clearly displayed."² An earlier observer and writer, Mr F. J. Hutchinson, British consul at Fernando Po, says "The idea of God entertained by the Kalabarese is confined to their incomprehensibility of natural causes, which they attribute to Abasi-Ibun, the Efik term for Almighty God; hence they believe He is too high and too great to listen to their prayers and petitions."³ The Rev. J. L. Wilson,

1. Fetichism in West Africa. Chapters II & IV.

2. Religion of Primitive Peoples. p. 133.

3. Impressions of West Africa. (Lon. 1858).

for eighteen years an American missionary in West Africa, writes,

"The belief in one great Supreme Being, who made and upholds all things, is universal. Nor is this idea imperfectly or obscurely engraved in their minds. The impression is so deeply engraved upon their moral and mental nature, that any system of atheism strikes them as too absurd and preposterous to require a denial. Everything which transpires in the natural world beyond the power of man, or of spirits, who are supposed to occupy a somewhat higher place than man, is at once and spontaneously ascribed to the agency of God. All of the tribes of the country with which the writer has become acquainted (and they are not a few) have a name for God, and many of them have two or more, significant of his character as a Maker, Preserver and Benefactor. In the Grebo country, Nyiswa is the common name for God, indicative of his character as a Maker. In Ashanti he has two names, viz:- Yankumpon, which signifies 'my Great Friend', and Yemi, 'my Maker'."¹

Such is the testimony of many expert and experienced witnesses to the fact that, throughout West Africa, both among Negro and Bantu tribes, there is a belief in a Supreme Deity. Evidence of the existence of such a belief among the Yorubas will now be given.

First, we have the witness of the names and titles given to this Deity:-

OLORUN. This is the name by which He is generally mentioned. It signifies "Owner of Heaven". Orun (the Yoruba word for "heaven") may be compared with the Greek Οὐρανός, and with the Varuna of the Rig-Veda, with which it may perhaps be philologically connected. Like the English "heavens" and the Hebrew רָקִיעַ, it is used for the "sky", as well as for the dwelling-place of the Deity. This title, then, expresses the greatness and majesty of God.

ELEDA. This word is derived from dà, "to create", from which we get ēda, "creation", and then Eleda, "maker (or owner) of creation". This term, therefore, signifies that He is the Maker and Preserver of the created universe. Logically, it follows that this conception of Him cannot have been derived, or evolved, from animism, for He, as Creator, must have existed prior to all the created universe. Dr Andrew Lang says "The Supreme Being of savage faiths as a rule never died at all. He belonged to a world that knew no death."¹ ALÂYE. This word, from yè, "to live", âye, "life", or "a living thing", denotes "the Owner of Life". It is more spiritual than the the last named term, referring to the living principle rather than the creature in which that principle resides. It must not be confounded with Alaiye, "the Owner of the world", or "of the universe", -aiye including both the earth and the heavens.

OLODUMARE. The derivation of this word is uncertain. It is generally taken to denote "the Almighty One". Bishops Crowther and Johnson so regard it, but the latter gives, as an alternative, "The Ever-righteous One". A slightly different form of the word is Oloḡumaye, "the Self-existent One".

ELEMÌ. "The Owner of Breath". Emi is "breath", or "spirit", (Greek πνεῦμα).

OGA-OGO. "The High One of Glory". This term is used, like the others given above, "only of the Supreme Being" (Crowther).

Other titles, such as Oluwa, 'Lord', commonly applied to Him, are sometimes given to Orishas, or to living human beings, and therefore are not given here.

The second line of evidence is found in the attributes ascribed to this Deity, Ọlọrun, by pure pagans, who have never been influenced by Christians or Mohammedans; although it is not suggested that every pagan Yoruba has a complete conception of all these attributes as belonging to Him. He is credited with omniscience, absolute power, justice, goodness and benevolence, and sometimes even omnipresence seems to be implied. He is called mimó, i.e. "holy", alānu, "merciful", and is said to preserve men's lives and to give them all good things,- notwithstanding the fact that prayer for particular blessings is generally offered to other gods, and, in many cases, even to the devil. The writer, visiting one morning in a village at some distance from Abeokuta, where there was no Christian, after offering the usual salutations, asked the following questions:- "Who created us?" - "Who preserves us?" - "Who gives us food?" - "Who sends us rain and sunshine?" To each question the answer was given "Ọlọrun ni", i.e., "It is God!" And this was the usual experience on such visits. Occasionally, some very ignorant person would say "Àṣẹ mọ!", i.e. "We do not know", or would give credit to his, or her, own particular idol; but such were rare exceptions.

Again, the proverbs of the Yoruba tribes, which are very many, often refer to Ọlórún, and in such a way as to show His supremacy and excellence, e.g., Èniti a kò le mú, a fi wón le Ọlórún lówó, i.e. "Those whom we cannot catch, we leave in the hands of God." This proverb implies belief in His omniscience, omnipotence and justice. And again, O fi ìja fun Ọlórún jà, fowó le ẹ̀rán, i.e. "Leave the battle to God, and rest your head upon your hand."

Moreover, in the case of the various Orishas, there is nearly always some history, or myth, to account for the origin of the particular cult. In the case of Ọlórún there is nothing of this kind. He is pre-existent to all human knowledge. In the language of the New Testament, He is "the Unknown God" - "having neither beginning of days nor end of life". There are traditional stories of His work in creation, and many West African negroes have traditions of a time when there was direct communication between heaven and earth.

The foregoing facts sufficiently establish the truth of the statement that the Yorubas have a conception of a Supreme Deity, who holds a position that is unique among their various Objects of Belief. He is to be regarded as probably the same Being whom the Tschwis call Nyankupon, the Gās, Nyonmo, the Ewes, Mawu, and the Bantu tribes of the south-west coast Nzambi, Anyambi etc.

The Yoruba pagan having some mental conception of this Supreme Deity, we next enquire as to his attitude of mind towards Him, first remarking that, while the study of African psychology is very fascinating, it is equally difficult and perplexing. Miss Mary Kingsley says "Stalking the West African idea is one of the most charming pursuits in the world...as beset with difficulty and danger as grizzly-bear hunting". African mentality is extremely complex, and equally variable, not only as between different individuals, but often in one and the same person.

Fear has been said to be the first element in religious psychology; but it does not appear to hold a prominent place in the Yoruba's conception of Olurun, as it does in his regard for the Orishas and the evil spirit Eshu. The only aspect of fear, as distinct from reverence, or awe, that seems to exist in this conception of Him, is the fear of retribution, and that, not in the sense of vindictiveness, but of offended justice. The feeling of Awe, or reverence, for Him is, however, strongly marked. He is spoken of as high and holy, and to such an extent that direct worship seems never to be offered to Him. The idea started by Ellis, and copied from him by Dennett and Miss Kingsley, that the Supreme Deity started the work of creation, both of the universe and of man, and then indolently left it to others and took no further interest in it, - became a spiritual nonentity in fact - and therefore is not worshipped, or regarded, is an utterly incorrect presentation of the Yoruba conception of Him. The reason that He is not directly worshipped is that He is regarded as too exalted for man to approach Him with the familiarity (albeit respectful) that is shown towards the lesser deities. The fact of the existence of this reverential awe, and also of a measure of Faith in Him, is clearly shown by the fact that He is constantly mentioned in daily conversation, as will be illustrated shortly. Although the higher aspects of Love to God are beyond the capacity of the unenlightened pagan mind, traces of love to Him are occasionally found among the more thoughtful and earnest Yorubas, and Gratitude (although often of an apparently conventional type) is constantly expressed.

The manifestation of this conception is shown both in a negative and in a positive manner.

On the negative side, Sacrifice, which in various forms plays such a large part in Yoruba worship, is never offered to Olurun. He is too high and (in a sense) too distant to be thus directly approached. Also, (as Dr Andrew Lang points out) the Supreme Deity, not being a ghost, or disembodied spirit, has no need of food offerings etc.

Again, Prayer, which is likewise constantly offered to the various Orishas and to Eshu (the devil), is never directly offered to God, except that, in cases of deepest distress, the ejaculation is uttered, Olurun sanu, i.e. "God have mercy!"

On the positive side, the nature of this conception of God is demonstrated by the fact that He is constantly spoken of in daily life, and that the salutations of the pagan Yorubas show trust in His preserving care and beneficent goodness. The final salutation at night is usually, O d'owuro ô! Qlorun yio ji ni rê ô! i.e. "Until the morning! May God wake us up well!" And the morning salutation corresponds, E k'owuro ô! Ô ji re bi? i.e. "Good morning! Do you wake well?" - to which the response is A dupe l'odo Qlorun! or, A yin Qlorun! i.e., "Thanks be to God!" or, "We praise God!" A similar reply is given to enquiries as to health etc. Again, when a kindness has been shown to any person, the usual response is Qlorun yio busi i fun o! i.e., "May God bless you!" or some similar expression of gratitude.

The Proverbs of the country, already quoted to show the belief in the Supreme Deity, also manifest the nature of that belief, as resting on His goodness, wisdom and might. Faith in His justice to execute judgement after death may be inferred from the following occasional remarks of Yorubas, smarting under a sense of wrong and of their own inability to avenge it:-

Ohun ti o semi yi ati emi ati iwo ni iro ó ni waju eniti o ri wa; i.e., "As to this thing which you have done to me, both I and you have to account for it before Him who sees us." The reference is to Qlorun, who is expressly named in the next quotation, - Nigbati emi ba kú, ati emi ati iwọ ni ilẹ ro ó ni wa ju Olórun; i.e., "Whenever I die, both I and you have to go and narrate it before God."¹

The higher knowledge of the Supreme Deity seems to be restricted to, and jealously guarded by, the few. One morning a youth was brought to the writer's dispensary in Abeokuta for treatment and was recommended as having a special claim upon the Christian missionary's consideration because he was Omo Olórun. An enquiry as to what this meant led to the explanation that, very occasionally, when Ifà (the supreme oracle) is consulted as to what Orisha a new-born child is to worship, the answer is given "He is to worship no Orisha: he is to be omo Olórun, i.e., "a child of God". Here we have a further proof that Olórun is not to be regarded as an "Orisha"; but stands apart as the Supreme Deity.

The question as to the origin of this conception in the pagan mind must be briefly considered. It has been suggested that this belief was derived from Mohammedan, or Christian, sources. Now the first introduction of Christianity into the Yoruba country was in A.D. 1838, when Christian Egbas, liberated slaves from Sierra Leone, returned to Lagos and Abeokuta. The first Christian missionaries were sent in 1845. The Yoruba belief in Olurun had existed for untold generations before these dates, as is evidenced by the ancient myths concerning His work in creation. There is no record or tradition of any previous Christian witness in the country.¹

The advance of Mohammedanism during the last thirty years has been very rapid, but prior to that time, although the Islamic faith had gained a certain number of adherents among the Yorubas, these were a very small proportion of the whole, and some parts of the country were quite untouched by its influence. The Yoruba conception of Olurun is quite distinct from the Islamic Allah, and there is not the slightest evidence on philological, philosophical, or historical grounds that the two are causally connected.

The Yoruba conception of the Supreme Deity must be regarded as belonging purely to the people in their pagan condition; but it is not so easy a matter to say certainly whence they derived it. It is difficult to believe that it can have been developed from Animism, for there is a wide gap to be bridged over between the highest of the lesser gods, or orishas, and the Supreme God, Olurun. Since He is conceived as being the Author of all creation, He must of necessity be pre-existent to that creation. No Yoruba would allow for a moment that Olurun was a deified man.

It has been pointed out by others that the belief in the Supreme Deity among primitive peoples is one which is hazy, and the deity concerned is found to be retiring towards a state of oblivion, and that this is clearly indicative of a declension from previous knowledge, rather than an advance into clearer and fuller truth. We shall have occasion to pursue this subject further in a later chapter.

AN EARLY ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSION. "Benin was discovered by the Portuguese in 1485. Alfonso de Aviro, the discoverer, on his return to Europe, was accompanied by an ambassador from the King of Benin to the Court of Portugal, with the request that Christian missionaries might be sent to instruct his people. Fernando Po was sent to the Gulf of Benin and ... ascended the Benin River to a place called Gaton, where he founded a Portuguese settlement. A church was built and 1000 persons baptised as adherents of the Roman Church. According to Barbot, at a later period, the King of Benin promised to bring over his whole kingdom to the Roman Catholic Church if he was provided with a white wife. The wife was sent, but no conversions seem to have followed, and the Portuguese soon lost possession of Benin." (There is no evidence of this mission having penetrated the Yoruba country proper.) - J.L. Wilson, Western Africa, p.191. S.S.F.)

CHAPTER IV.

THE OBJECTS OF BELIEF. (B) THE ORISHAS.

Under the term Orisha (Orisa) are included many gods, stated by the priests generally to be 401 in number, although some say 201, but probably the actual number is at least 600, if not more. The figures given by the priests are the old sacred numbers; but as they have been added to from time to time by the consecration of new deities they can no longer be correct. These orishas vary greatly in the powers attributed to them and in the respect paid to them. Some of them, according to the mythology of the country, were always spirits, of divine origin, existing prior to all creation; others are deified men; others again are the spirits of animals, trees, rocks etc. They may be classified (according to the respect paid to them) as general orishas, worshipped throughout the country; local deities; and personal ones. The first class will include most of the nature-gods, and the latter two many tutelary ones.

The word "orisha" (orisa) is of uncertain derivation. It is usually regarded as from ri, "to see" or "find", and ṣa, "to pick up, select, or choose". Bishop Johnson says this term "was originally applied to some beings whom Ifà, or Orúnmìlà, the Son of God, had sent out to search about for, and collect together, the wisdom which he had strewn about, and who were successful in their search and collection,- whilst others failed, - and who were spoken of as awon ti oríṣa, i.e., those who were successful in making their collection, and who after, and in consequence of this, became objects of worship." Other suggestions have been made, of which Dennett's conjecture that it means "the beatified departed one" (as if from ore, "a departed spirit") cannot be correct, since the chief orishas never were human beings, and so cannot be ores, or departed spirits!

Modes of worship will be dealt with in a later chapter; but we may note here that each orisha has its own special day for worship, demands its own special sacrifices, and enjoins its own ewò, the Yoruba term for 'taboo'. When reference is made to any orisha as demanding human sacrifices, it denotes that such were offered until the country came under British government thirty years ago, when all such were forbidden; but afterwards, even when British officers were stationed in Ibadan to enforce the keeping of the treaty abolishing such practices, the writer had personal experience of the offering of a human sacrifice in the said town, in the year 1894. It is quite possible that such are secretly offered even now.

It is certain that some of the Yoruba divinities have been borrowed from other tribes. This is the case with Shango, the god of lightning, and his wife Oya, the river Niger, who have both been imported from the Niger territory. Ekó-Ifá comes from the Akoko tribe, Aje from the Ekùn, or Popo tribe.

We now proceed to the consideration of some of the more important orishas.

IFÀ. Although not possessing so great a number of personal devotees as some of the other gods, Ifá may be regarded as the most important and the supreme orisha, for he is the greatest oracle of the whole Yoruba country and is consulted on all important occasions. He decides what orisha each new-born child is to worship. He tells, in time of trouble, famine, sickness, etc., which gods have been offended and what sacrifices they demand.

There are various mythical stories as to the origin of this cult. One of these states that he was the offspring of Obatala and Odudua, who were pre-existent to man, so that Ifà is not a deified man, but was a god before the creation of the world. On the other hand, in a Yoruba pamphlet, published by the Egba government in Abeokuta in 1906, by Mr Oyesile Keribo, on the "History of the Gods", he writes as follows:-

"Ifa was a native of Itase near the Ifè country, and of poor parentage. In his youth he had great aversion to manual labour and therefore had to beg his bread. To better his condition he applied to a wise man for advice, and this sage taught him the art of divination, traditional stories with matters relating thereto, and medicine, as an easy means of obtaining a livelihood. He afterwards became very popular. The sixteen original odus correspond to the sixteen original stories taught to Ifa, etc.

His parents, being poor, were not known in the country. Hence he was afterwards considered as without parentage and was deified after death."

Other accounts represent him as a skilful medical man and diviner, born at Ifè, and, according to some, very popular, but to others unpopular. Colonel Ellis says:-

"He tried to teach prediction to the inhabitants of Ifè; but they would not listen, so he left the town and wandered about, indulging in a variety of amours, then fixed his abode at Ado, where he planted a palm-nut on a rock, whence sprang up sixteen palm-trees at once."

No reliance can be placed on any of these stories, which appear to have been invented by lovers of the marvellous, to gain a reputation for knowledge. The following myth, however, has much more importance, as explaining the very close connection between Ifà and Eshu, which exists to the present day:¹

In the early days of the world, when the human race was few in number, the gods were stinted in sacrifices and so often went hungry and had to forage for themselves. Ifà took to fishing, but had no success, and, being hungry, consulted Eshu (who is also called Elegba), who told him that if he could obtain sixteen palm-nuts from the two palm-trees of Orungan, the chief man, he would show Ifà how to forecast the future. Ifa could then use his knowledge to forecast the future and benefit mankind, and so receive abundance of offerings in return; but he stipulated that the first choice of all offerings should be his. Ifà agreed, and went to Orungan to ask for the nuts, telling him for what purpose he required them.

Orungan, delighted at the prospect, took his wife with him and hastened to get the nuts; but, finding the trees too high, drove the monkeys to them, who ate the pulp of the fruit and threw down the "nuts", i.e., the hard shell which contains an oily kernel.

Orungan's wife, Orishabi by name, tied these in her waist-cloth, as a child is carried, and so bore them to Ifà. Eleggba (Eshu) then taught Ifà, who in turn, taught Orungan, and so made him the first babalawo. Therefore, when a man goes to consult

Ifa, his wife always accompanies him, or, if he is unmarried, his mother, and the woman carries the sixteen palm-nuts. Also, the babalawo, before beginning the divining process, utters the invocation, Orungan, a juba ô! Orishabi, a juba ô! i.e.,

"Orungan, we respect thee! Orishabi, we regard thee!"

The priests of Ifà are called babalawos (baba-li-awo, 'the father who has the secret') and find their office very lucrative, so that a proverb says, "the wisest priest is he who adopts the worship of Ifà". These priests pluck off all hair, shave their heads, and generally wear white cloths, although some, as those at Ifẹ, wear light blue.

In consulting the oracle, the babalawo uses sixteen palm-nuts, from a special palm-tree (the Opèlifà), and a divining bowl, i.e., an engraved circular board, or a rectangular one, with a handle, similar to a Mohammedan writing tablet, shaped thus,

Sometimes a fan is used, of a square shape. This divining bowl is called Opón-Ifà. Its surface is covered with white flour (Iyerosu), or dust, from the irosu tree. Upon this the priest works, and with one of the fingers of the right hand imprints certain signs, to indicate such Ifà representatives as may be left in the palm of his left hand, after he has attempted with one grasp of the palm of his right hand to take up all the sixteen nuts which were held therein. Or, he may hold these sixteen nuts loosely in the right hand and throw them through his half-closed fingers into the left hand. If two nuts remain in the right hand, he makes one mark, thus |, on the board, but if only one remains, he makes two such marks, ||. This process is repeated eight times, and the marks are made in two columns of four each. The complicated nature of this process is shown by the fact that behind each of the sixteen nuts are sixteen subordinate deities. Each such deity is termed an Odù, i.e., a "chief" or "head". There are thus $16 \times 16 = 256$ leading Odùs, and each of these 256 has 16 subordinates again, bringing the total number of Odùs to 4,096. Some increase this again by multiplying each of these by 16 lesser subordinates! Add to these figures the fact that in the 8 throwings, or drawings, of the 16 nuts, there is a possibility of a vast number of different results, and that in connection with each Odù there are supposed to be 1680 traditional stories, each of which is represented by a brief couplet, which must be memorized, and it will be seen that the task of a babalawo is no light one, even if he confines his attention, as is usually the case, to the 16 principal Odùs. Most babalawos commit to memory a large number of the couplets, or stories in brief, connected with each of the principal ones. Then, when an Odù appears on the consulting bowl, the diviner thinks of the most appropriate story attached to it, suitable to the case about which he is consulted, and so gives the oracular response and prescribes the appropriate sacrifice. It follows that these men should be deep thinkers, and such is found to be the case.

The response of an Odù is given in the form of a parable. So that it is a common saying

Owe ni Ifà ipa,
Omóràn ni imô -
Bi a ba wipe a mô - Nigbatì a ko ba mô,
A ni, ko sẹ!

that is

"Ifa always speaks in parables,
 It is the wise man who understands -
 If we should say we understand -
 The wise man will understand -
 When we do not understand,
 We say, It is of no account!"

(or, "It is not fulfilled!")

When the babalawo is particularly fortunate, and Eji Ogbè, the prince of all the Odùs, appears on the edge of the bowl, he may be heard saying, with the authority of Eji Ogbè,

(Bi a ba bọ oju,)

Bi a ba bo oju,

Bi a ba bo imu,

Isale agbón ni a ipari rẹ.

Ada fun Orúnmilà nigbatijo nlo gba ase l'owo

Olodumarè, o rubo. . . Olodumarè si wa fi ase fun u.

Nigbati gbogbo aiye gbó pe o ti gba ase l'owo

Olodumarè, nwon si nwọ tọ. Gbogbo eyiti o wi si nse. . . Lati igba na wa ni a nwipe, A se!

that is,

"When we wash our face,

When we wash our nose,

We finish off beneath the chin.

Ifà was consulted for Orunmila once, going to receive authority from the Almighty. He sacrificed. And the Almighty gave him authority. When all the world heard that he had received authority from the Almighty they came to him. All that he said came to pass. Ever since then we say "It will come to pass!"

The cost of initiation as a babalawo is very great, sometimes as much as £150, a vast sum to a Yoruba. The course of training is long (from 3 to 7 years) and the ritual of initiation elaborate, including purification by water, and the test of extinguishing the Odù fire, or Pinodù, as explained in chapter II.

While the chief function of Ifà is that of divination, he is also credited, as a secondary one, with the power to cause fecundity. Women pray to him to be made fruitful; therefore offerings are made to him before marriage, sterility being accounted a disgrace. But, although Ifà is supposed to cause conception, he does not form the child in utero, that being the office of Obàtálá.

He has many subsidiary titles, one of the most important of these being QRUNMILA, which means literally "Heaven knows salvation". ELA, another of his attributive names, and a principal one, is a contraction of Orúnmilà, and is intended to represent him to his worshippers chiefly in the character of Saviour and Deliverer, one that is strong and mighty, unconquerable even by death, so that all who look to him for help in any time of trouble, or threatened evil, even in death, will not fail to receive his help. Although this name is used as if it represented a separate and distinct personality, and is attached to a separate and distinct representative figure, made of pieces of ivory, carrying four eyelets each and corresponding in number to the Ifà palm-nuts (Ikin), which, with one Oduṣo, are 17 in all, Èlà is, nevertheless, the same deity as Ifà, represented after a special manner. Very special and lofty titles are given to him, and in songs and proverbs full salvation is ascribed to him. His worshippers say, "Awa di Oyigiyigi, a ki o kú mo", i.e., "We ourselves are become Oyigiyigi, (i.e., the stone which gave birth to Ifà) and we can die no more!" Èlà holds a very high place in Ifà worship, and is found in connection with each of the 256 Odùs of the system. It is always humbly and reverently invoked and its favour sought for acceptance: whenever Ifà is to be worshipped with a sacrifice, e.g., "O thou Èla! Son of the Ruler,

I humble myself before thee!"

or,

"O Èla! I praise the sacrifice of acceptance, -
O Èla! I praise the life-giving sacrifice, - O Èla! I praise the sacrifice of labour."

OPELE is the name of a lesser oracle, who is regarded as a messenger of Ifà. He is represented by eight small laths of wood, and as it is a far easier task to consult him, the babalawos do so each day, and in all lesser causes; but Ifà must be consulted every fifth day (Yoruba reckoning), for that ushers in the new week and is Ifà's day, and at any other time on any important matter. The bandicoot is sacred to Opele, since it lives chiefly on palm-nuts. On Ifà's day, sacrifices of pigeons, fowls and goats are made to him, and on very important occasions he has demanded human sacrifice.

There are other divinities which are consulted as oracles, but this is not their chief function, and they are (as oracles) all inferior to Ifà. Some are local, and only approachable at special seasons, as the Oro Ilare of the Ijeshas (a sub-division of the Yoruba race) in the north-east. This deity is said to come to earth once a year, when he dwells in a special grove, and is waited upon and consulted by an Awòrò, a chief priest. The orishas Qsun, Yemaja, and Qsosi are consulted by their devotees, and so is Esù (Elegbara), the evil spirit, whose answer is never disregarded.

QBATALA. We have dealt with Ifà first, as being the great oracle, and so seeming to attain greater prominence than the other orishas. Next to him in importance, and exceeding him in the number of his worshippers, is Qbàtálá. This name signifies "King of whiteness". He is the god of purity. Another title is Orìṣàlá (i.e. Orìṣá - nlá) i.e. "the great orisha". Other designations are Qbaba Arugbo ("The ancient King-Father"), Orìṣapopo, ("the orìṣá who kneads clay") and Orìṣa Oj'enia ("the orisha who enters man"). These last two names refer to his traditional part in the creation of humanity. He is also called Orìṣa-gbingbiniki, i.e. "The huge (or bulky) orisha" (Crowther).

A tradition of his origin is that he was made by Olórun, who, after he had created the universe, handed it over to Qbàtálá to set it in order, give the finishing touches, and then conduct its course. The myths concerning him (as in the case of all the leading orishas) are far more anthropomorphic than anything told of Olórun. They tell how God formed man in the rough, and left Qbàtálá to give him a face, eyes, ears, nose, mouth and skull, - presumably, brain also, - so that the senses and intellect of man are ascribed to him. A second myth says Qbàtálá formed man out of clay. Yet another myth says that Odudua (not Ọlọrun,--see below) formed man's body of clay and Ọbàtálá completed the work as just stated, and that Olodumare ("the Almighty", i.e. Ọlọrun) breathed into man and so he became "a living soul". It is the work of Ọbàtálá (when Ifà has caused conception) to form the child in utero; hence any physical defect in the new-born child is attributed to him, and such child is dedicated to him from birth. This is notably the case with albinos. It is supposed that such defects are to show his displeasure at having been neglected, or to demonstrate his power.

Another of his offices is that of civic guardianship. He is called "protector of the town gates", and is roughly depicted on the doors of his temples as a horseman with a spear, attended by a leopard, tortoise, fish and serpent. His image, likewise, is that of the horseman with a spear.

His worshippers must wear white clothes, and eat white food, using shea-butter (instead of the usual red palm-oil) in their cooking, abstaining from red meat, and using and offering the white (or "bitter") kola instead of the red one. His special offering is that of edible snails. The necklace worn by his worshippers must be of opaque white beads.

There is no record of his ever desiring human sacrifice. According to one myth he once lived on earth, attaining a very great age, but was so disgusted with man's ways that he voluntarily ascended to heaven.¹ It will be seen that this orisha represents the highest conception of goodness depicted in Yoruba polytheism, apart from the belief in the Supreme God. He exemplifies the nearest approach to the Jewish conception of the "Word".²

ODUDUA. As Obàtálá is the highest male orisha among the Yorubas, so Odudua (also called Odua) is the chief goddess. In one point she excels Obàtálá, for she is not said to have been made by Olórun, but to have had independent existence, before that great orisha was created.

Here again the derivation of the name is uncertain. It may come from dudu ("black") and iwà ("existence") and so mean "the Black One". F.S. - the unidentified writer of a series of articles on Yoruba deities in the Nigerian Chronicle - says that this title was given, after his death, to one of the original immigrants into Yorubaland about the eleventh or twelfth century, and that his real name was lost. He regards Odudua as a contraction of

1. F.S.- Nigerian Chronicle, Vol. i, No. 18, March 19, 1909.

2. Dennett calls Orishala "the female form of Obatala". I have not found any ground for this. Yet the accounts given by different natives vary so greatly that some may hold this idea, but it is not general. S.S.F.

Odu ti o dà wa, which means a "self-existent personage", - literally it is "Chief who created us", or "...who created existence". The myths given by this writer vary greatly from the generally received traditions of the country, and are strongly Euhemeristic. He gives a human origin for leading orishas, which, according to general tradition, existed prior to the creation of man; but his interesting stories would be more acceptable if they had some authoritative corroboration.

Odudua is also called Iya Agbe, i.e., "Mother of the Gourd", or "...of the closed calabash". She is always figured in a sitting posture, nursing a child. She is said to be the wife of Ọbàtálá, and their union is sometimes regarded as symbolizing the union between the earth and the heavens, i.e., the sky. The babalawos illustrate this union by two large flat cut calabashes, carefully whitened, which, having been once joined, can never be opened. These are kept in their temples, the one over the other, to represent the meeting of earth and sky on the horizon.

The myths do not represent her in any favourable light, but credit her with blindness, which was inflicted on her by her husband, who tore out her eyes as a punishment, because in the beginning of the world, when they were both shut up in the darkness of a closed calabash, she complained bitterly and railed on him. As soon as he blinded her, she cursed him in the words, "Naught shalt thou eat but snails". Again, she is said to have forsaken her husband through an illicit passion for a hunter. She fled from Ifè to Ado (fifteen miles from Badagry). There a town was built and a temple dedicated in her honour, and there, at her festival season, cattle and sheep are sacrificed, and the women who are her devotees give themselves up to unbridled immorality in her honour. She is regarded as the patroness of "love" (1). The term ado is applied as a reproach to immoral persons of either sex. It is remarkable that such a good deity as Ọbàtálá should be credited with having such a wicked wife.

YEMAJA. Before Ọbàtálá was deserted by Odudua, she is said to have borne him a son and a daughter, Aganju and Yemaja respectively. This brother and sister eventually married and had a son, Orungan, who committed incest with his mother Yemaja. She fled from him in horror and shame; but he pursued her until she fell. Her body swelled to a great size; from her breasts there flowed two streams of water which became a lagoon, and from her body issued a number of different orishas, including Shango, the god of lightning, Oya (the Niger), Oshun, and Oba - three rivers which became the three wives of Shango -; Olokun (god of the sea), Oloosa (the lagoon-goddess), Orishako (farm-god) Okè (god of the hills), Dada (vegetable-god), Ajé-Shaluga (god of wealth), Ogún (war-god), Oshorí (hunters' god), and Sopono (small-pox god).¹ - According to this myth, the sacred town of Ifè was built on the site of this marvelous catastrophe, and became the sacred city of Yemaja. The place where her body fell used to be shown, but the original town was destroyed in the war between the Ibadans and Modakekes and the people of ifè in the year 1882. The town was rebuilt and is still the most sacred spot in the whole country. It will be noticed that nearly all the mythical stories are connected with this place, and that this particular myth makes Yemaja to be the mother, and Obátálá and Odudua the grandparents, of a number of leading deities, all being nature-gods. There are, however, very many other orishas whose descent is not so traced.

In practice, we find that Yemaja is a goddess who is greatly venerated. She is the presiding goddess of the

¹. Ellis includes Orun (the sun) and Oshu (the moon), but these are not now regarded as orishas, nor is any worship offered to them.

SHRINE OF THE GODDESS YEMAJA

river Ogun, which flows past Abeokuta and into the lagoon near Lagos. The accompanying photograph shows a shrine dedicated to her in Abeokuta, which the writer has passed scores of times. He has never seen a heathen man, or woman, pass it without doing reverence. This is the only such shrine, or temple, of which he could say this. Some worshippers simply inclined the head towards the central image, others laid hold of the thatched roof and bowed, others again entered the hut, prostrated themselves and embraced the image. This image was small, a crudely engraved piece of wood, covered with a cloth. The dilapidated water-pots contained water brought up from the sacred river Ogun. The worshippers of Yemaja wear a necklace of small beads of clear glass. Of Yemaja's husband, Aganju, and their son Orungan, little is known, nor do they seem to receive any worship, except that Orungan is saluted when Ifà is consulted. Aganju means a "wilderness", or broad expanse, as a great forest or the ocean. Orungan signifies "noon", or the sun at its zenith.

SHANGO. No deity, perhaps, is better known, or more worshipped throughout Yorubaland, than Shango, the god of lightning, although those already described may be more ancient. This is the more remarkable, because he is not strictly of Yoruba origin, but was introduced from the Niger territory. The derivation of Shango is obscure; but he has another name, by which he is frequently called, Jakuta, which means "Stone-thrower". Some speak of Jakuta as a separate deity; but this is not generally accepted. The probability is that Jakuta is the ancient name of the Thunder-god, and that when Shango was deified (as related below) he was identified with the deity who had formerly been known as Jakuta. Ellis describes him as purely "anthropomorphic - He dwells in the clouds in an immense brazen palace, where he maintains a large retinue and a great number of horses ... He hurls on those who have offended him red-hot chains of iron, which are forged for him by his brother Ogun, a god of the river Ogun (sic) of iron and of war; but this it should be observed, is seemingly a modern notion, and the red-hot chains furnished by Ogun have a suspicious resemblance to the thunderbolts of Jupiter forged by Vulcan".¹ The colonel does not say whence he derived this information, but that his informant was not reliable is shown by one glaring mistake—the god Ògún being described as god of the river Ogun. The accentuation of the deity's name is different from that of the river, over whom the presiding deity is the goddess Yemaja.

There are various mythical stories about Shango¹---, all more or less unreliable; but that he was an historical personage is clearly established. The facts as generally accepted, and given as history in Iwe Kika Ekerin, the Yoruba Fourth Reader, used in the upper forms of all the elementary schools, are to the following effect:--

About two centuries ago (?) there reigned as King in the old town of Oyo (known to early explorers as Eyeo, or Katunga), which was situated near the south bank of the river Niger, to the north of the Yoruba country, one Shango, who was a powerful and wise monarch. He was a great medicine man or witch-doctor, and claimed to be able to kill people by ejecting fire from his mouth. His reign was tyrannical and cruel. He had two chief ministers, of whom he was jealous, and set these to fight against each other, hoping both might be slain; but he was himself deposed by the one who came off victor in the fight. Shango fled, accompanied by his three wives, Oya, Oshun, and Oba, and some of his most loyal followers. He wandered in the bush, being gradually deserted by all, until only his favourite wife Qya remained. Then in despair, Shango hung himself from an âyàn tree. Qya fled north and became the presiding goddess of the river Niger. Travellers, who had seen the body of Shango hanging from a tree, entered the town and reported Oba so, i.e. "the King has hanged himself." This report spread throughout the town. The friends of Shango were so incensed that they determined to avenge their deceased monarch. They took a number of small calabashes, or hollow gourds, and filled them with gunpowder. They then covered them with cocoanut fibre and put slow matches to them, and waited for the next tornado. When this came, they ignited the bombs and threw them into the thatched roofs of many houses. The resultant explosions and fires caused the panic-stricken people to cry out, "Why are all our houses burning?" The friends of Shango then came forward, saying, "Oh you said Oba so (the King has hanged himself) - Oba ko so! (the King has not hanged himself) He is angry with you for this. He has become a god and has gone up into heaven and sent down the lightning to punish you. You must bring out oxen, sheep, fowls, palm oil, etc., and offer sacrifices to him, and henceforth worship him, and then he will forgive you."

Thus they established the worship due to him as an orisha. Thus Qba so and Qba kò so are proverbial sayings, used respectively by those who want to annoy Shango's worshippers, and the worshippers themselves. The small town of Kuso, near to Qyọ, is sacred to this deity. Its name is a corruption of Kò so. The priests of Shango are called Oni-Shango, or Odushushango. Their chief ^{run on} priests are called Magbas. >

Magba (emi a gbà = "I will take") signifies "a receiver". The priests wear a wallet to "receive" the plunder, or fines which they impose. In some parts, persons struck dead by lightning may not be buried until the body is ransomed from the Magbas, by whom persons struck insensible, but not killed, were formerly despatched. In their chants they speak of Shango as hurling stones (ja - "to throw" okuta - "a stone"). When a house is struck by lightning they rush in a body to the house, "to find the stone", - no difficult matter since they take the said stone with them!¹ They appropriate all the property which they can save from the flames, as "their god has claimed it and given it to them". A chant of the Shango worshippers, which is often heard, may be translated thus:-

¹. See the photograph on p.129a.

THE SACRED AXE OF SHANGO

O Shango, thou art the master!
 Thou takest in thy hand the fiery stones
 To punish the guilty!
 To satisfy thy anger!
 Everything they strike is destroyed.
 The fire eats up the forest,
 The trees are broken down,
 And all things living are slain.

A very common malediction is "May Shango's stone strike you!"

Shango's three wives, as stated above, are the three rivers, Qya (the Niger), Qsun (Qshun) and Qba, these last being two of the smaller rivers of the Yoruba country.

Shango has among his attendants (1) Oshumare, the rainbow, who conveys water from the earth to his palace in the clouds, and (2) Oru, the thunder-clap, whom he sends out as his messenger with great noise. The bird papagori is sacred to Shango, and the Magbas pretend to understand its speech.

The image of Shango, made of wood, is usually a man standing, surrounded by three smaller figures, i.e. his wives, with the palms of their hands joined together in front of their bosoms.

ÒGÚN. Next in importance to Shango is Ògún, the god of iron and of war, and pre-éminently the god of hunters. He may be regarded as the Yoruba Nimrod. He is worshipped by blacksmiths, and generally by all users of iron implements, therefore by warriors and hunters. Any piece of iron may represent him, as also may pieces of stone. The Yoruba blacksmith's anvil is a block of stone and is worshipped by him. The accentuation of the name is important, for the word ogun has a variety of significations, according to its accentuation, or (more correctly) the musical intonation placed upon its two syllables. The failure to recognize this has often caused this orisha to be confounded with the river Ogun, and with the term ogùn, used as a general expression for "medicine", usually in a bad sense.

Ògún is stated to have been one of the sons of Yemaja, so that he is one of the earlier deities, pre-éxistent to man, and not a deified human being. It is said that he first taught men to hunt and that he indicated to them the trees which are specially sacred to himself. These are the peregun, (the majestic silk-cotton tree), the akoko, (a tree, the flower of which is sucked for its juice), and the atori, (a tree of very beautiful appearance, remarkable for its elasticity, and from which bows are made).

SHRINE OF OGUN - GOD OF WAR

Ògún directed men to dig four holes before a tree and implant in them four wooden posts to support a platform or altar, on which his offerings were to be placed. The accompanying photograph (taken by the writer in Abeokuta) shows one of these trees with four elephants' jaws placed at its foot. This shrine was doubtless dedicated as a thank-offering by hunters after a successful elephant hunt. The chief sacrifice offered to Ògún (except ^{the} human sacrifice offered before going to war) is the dog; but fowls are also offered, with the usual accompaniment of palm-oil and lesser articles of food. A proverb says "an old dog must not be offered to Ògún, i.e. nothing inferior must be given to him. A dog's head, or skull, is usually to be seen fastened up in every blacksmith's shop, signifying that this sacrifice has been made. This must be renewed each year. Hunters in the African wilds carry their lives in their hands, consequently they are very particular in serving their gods. Before going on an expedition they usually offer sacrifices to Ògún and Òshòsì (who is a lesser god of the chase) and also to Eshu, whom they consult as to their course of action. They kill a cock and pour out its blood to the evil deity. The writer saw this being done at mid-day one Sabbath, as he was returning from taking service in a mission church in Abeokuta. Two men, crouching as low as possible at the roadside, their ankles, knees and hip-joints fully flexed, and their heads bent low, almost hid from view their victim, which was held by one of them, while the other cut its throat and poured out the blood on the devil-stone. The dead fowl is then usually presented at the shrine of Ògún, and afterwards taken away and eaten, kola-nuts being presented to the orisha. Oshosi being an inferior deity has to be content with roasted beans!

In former days, before going to war, a human sacrifice had to be offered to Ògún. The victim's head was struck off upon the stool of Ògún, so that the blood gushed out upon it. (This is more fully described in a later chapter.)

ORISHAKO. Orisa Oko, contracted to Orishako, is "god of the farm", i.e. of agriculture. A temple dedicated to him is to be found in almost every town, or village. He is particularly worshipped by women and has a number of priestesses. These really form a secret society of their own, and are so powerful, and so highly respected, that no man dare injure or offend any of them. They are distinguished by wearing, stuck on to the middle of the forehead, a small vertical badge, about one inch long and 1/6th inch wide, half red and half white. How this badge is made, and how caused to adhere is a secret only known to the wearers. Should the badge become loose, it may be removed and eaten; but must on no account be allowed to fall to the ground. It is accounted the highest honour to have this priesthood in the family, although the expense of initiation, and of maintaining the worship, is very great. The initiation ceremony in each case costs from £40 to £50 (a large sum to a Yoruba). The writer knew one very well-to-do family which was brought to poverty through the expense of worshipping this orisha. When once the iron staff has been introduced into a family it cannot be got rid of! The office is hereditary in the family, but not necessarily in the direct line. When a vacancy occurs Ifà is consulted and determines who of the family is to become priestess. A woman in Abeokuta who belonged to this cult, gave the following account of how the worship was introduced into her own family to a relative of hers - at that time a schoolmaster, now a highly respected clergyman - who was collecting information for the writer:-

When two women had a quarrel, one would accuse the other of witchcraft (àjẹ). The accused replied "O dara!

ẹ jẹ k'a lo si Irawo, i.e. "Very well! Let us go to Irawo".
The accuser then replied "Yes! let us go!" This, as will be seen, was a challenge to one form of trial by ordeal, which must involve the death of one of the disputants. They then each prepared a calabash, scraped perfectly clean and white, together with a sacrifice, and a present for the priest to whom they were going. For some days before setting out they perambulated their own town, each advertizing her grievance:- "So-and-so accuses me of being a witch. If I am guilty, may Polo kill me", or "I accuse So-and-so of being a witch. If I am guilty, may Polo kill me." They then took their journey to Irawo, the town sacred to the worship of Orishako. On arrival, they stated their case to the priest and each presented to him her own calabash, together with the present. They then had to lie prostrate on the earth for three days, while the priest was within the temple—apparently consulting the god. On the third day he reappeared and, as they still lay prostrate before him, swing over their heads a heavy iron club, chanting as he did so Polo pa á; Polo jowọ rẹ -, Polo pa á; Polo jowọ rẹ. i.e. "Polo kill her; Polo let her go!" etc.

Having repeated this invocation a sufficient number of times, he then again retired into the temple, and came forth a second time, bearing in his hands the two calabashes, and returned each to its respective owner. Whereas the inside of each was perfectly white when committed to him, they now found on lifting the lids, that, while the one remained white, the whole of the interior of the other was a jet black, condemning its owner as the guilty one. Instantly the priest slew this unfortunate one with the iron club, "Polo". The innocent party was not yet free. She had to purchase, at a great cost, this iron club, which became her Orisha, that is to say, she became its slave, or in other words, a priestess of Orishako.

par. Ellis says correctly "an emblem of Orisha Oko is an iron rod and honey bees are his messengers." But when he goes on to say "It is probably with reference to his phallic attributes that he has the title of Eni-duru - ~~the~~ the erect personage" (which Dennett copies from him), he is certainly in error; for the correct translation of this term is "hard person" (a possible reference to his severe administration of justice!). Eni = "person", duru (always, and only) means "hard", or "difficult".

Ellis confounds this latter word with duro, which means "to stand", chiefly in the sense of halting or waiting, e.g. duro de mi = "wait for me".

The first and chief significance of Orishako is fertility of the earth. He is the harvest-god, and is worshipped at the new moon. His annual "harvest festival" is at the season when the new yams are ripe. This is a season of rejoicing, and public processions and dancing take place in the streets; when it is true, alas! that there is a great deal of open shameless immorality.

The priestesses, as brides of the orisha, are allowed free licence according to their own fancy; but ~~they~~ they are not common property, as Ellis seems to state, and any man who insulted one of them would do so at his peril. The lower classes of people would at this season take advantage of the licence allowed, both at this festival and also that of the other farm-god, Oké. It is not necessary to detail, as some other writers have done, the abominations of the heathen in these semi-religious rites. The infamy of heathendom, branded on its face by the apostle Paul in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans, is abundantly exhibited at certain times in Yoruba-land. Two things may be thankfully noted here;- first, that apart from these festivals a strict morality is generally enforced and practised; secondly, that through Christian influence, and now the rapid advance of European civilization, a great restraint is being exercised in these matters.

ŞOPONŌ. This god is called by Col. Ellis, who is again followed by Dennett, "Shankpanna", but the name is ŞopponŌ (pronounced "Shaw-paw-naw"). He is the disease small-pox personified, and is one of the thirteen orishas which sprang from the body of Yemaja. There is, however, a myth which describes him as of human origin.¹ Col. Ellis, in his work Ewe-speaking Peoples,² says that the god of small-pox is called by them Sopoton; from which it appears possible that this cult was introduced from Dahomey, as Shango was from the Niger.

The name is possibly derived from şon ("to take by small quantities" - a reference to the nature of the skin eruption), pa ("to kill"), and enia ("a person"), the three words being contracted to ŞopponŌ, i.e., "He who kills people by littles". He is sometimes said to have, as his companion and attendant, Buku, who strangles those who are attacked. Ellis gives a good description of him:-

². Op. cit. p.52.

"Shankpanna (sic) is old and lame and is depicted as limping along with the aid of a stick. According to a myth, he has a wooden leg. One day, when all the gods were assembled at the palace of Obatala and were dancing and making merry, Shankpanna endeavoured to join in the dance; but owing to his deformity, stumbled and fell. All the gods and goddesses thereupon burst out laughing, and Shankpanna in revenge strove to infect them with small-pox, but Obatala came to the rescue, and, seizing his spear drove Shankpanna away. From that day Shankpanna was forbidden to associate with the other gods, and he became an outcast, who has since lived in desolate and uninhabited tracts of country".

Consequently, we find that shrines and temples dedicated to him are always away in the "bush", and at some distance from the town, or hamlet, so as to keep him away from the human abodes. There is also probably the additional motive, that the priests of this god are glad to have secret, sheltered places, wherein to work out their evil purposes. The disease, or the "god", is greatly dreaded, and when an outbreak occurs these priests claim the property of all who die from the complaint. "Their god has claimed the sufferer and all his possessions". The people are so terrified that they will accept any terms, and pay almost any fine, that the priests impose upon them as the price of their mediation to induce the god to stay his afflicting hand. These priests make it their business to spread the disease. The following materials can be found in the house of every priest, or priestess, as emblems of the presence of this god, and (may we not say?) as stock-in-trade for spreading the disease. A calabash containing some portion of the body of a victim of the disease, a pot of black liquid made with water from the body of such victim, a vessel of black powder compounded with dried scabs, etc., from a sufferer. This liquid, or the powder, is thrown at night into the entrance of dwellings of prospective victims.¹

The emblem is a roughly carved stick, as shown in the accompanying illustration, copied from one in the writer's possession. It is of hard wood, in length 10 inches, and about $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter. It is purposely made in a rough fashion.

IBEJI. Another prominent orisha is that of the "Twin-gods", Ibeji, (from ibi = "birth", eji = "two"). It is remarkable that, in different parts of the country,

the birth of twins is regarded, and treated, from opposite points of view. In the Eastern part of Yoruba-land, i.e. the district of Ondo, and throughout the adjoining territory of the Niger Delta, it has always been demanded that twins should be put to death as soon as possible after birth. Dr. Nassau says " in the Gaboon country, where they are welcomed, it is nevertheless considered necessary to have special ceremonies performed for the safety of their lives, or if they die, to prevent further evil". In central and western Yoruba-land, e.g. Ibadan, Abeokuta, etc., such children are honoured, and accorded a certain degree of worship in their life-time. Should one of them die, the mother has a wooden image made to represent it, and carries this about with her, washing and dressing it, even as the living child. The elder of twins always has the name Taiwo (to-aiye -wo = "to taste the world") as being the first to taste the world; the younger is always called Kainde (Kehin-de = "To come behind"). The orisha Ibeji is, of course, the tutelary deity of such children. There is a black species of monkey, which dwells chiefly in mangrove bushes or near the sea and is very agile. It is sacred to this deity, and, although not itself an orisha, may have offerings of fruit made to it. It is ẽwò (taboo) to twins and their parents, who therefore may not kill it, or eat its flesh. Its name is Edun Dudu, or Edun oriokun, i.e. "black twin", or "sea-side twin" (Bp. Crowther). There is a notable temple to Ibeji at a place called Erupe, situated on the lagoon between Lagos and Badagry. All twins and parents of twins are supposed to make at least one pilgrimage to this shrine. Some of them come from a great distance to do so. The accompanying photograph is taken from images of the Twin-gods given to the writer, by a woman who had worshipped them until her conversion to Christianity.

QBALOFON. is described as the "god of the peace of the Kingdom". Although not so well-known as some of the others, he is the possessor of considerable power. He is the only deity to which a human sacrifice was publicly offered during the period of the writer's sojourn in Abeokuta. Of this sacrifice an account is given in the chapter on "Worship".

ROCKS NEAR ABEEKUTA.

CHAPTER V.

THE OBJECTS OF BELIEF. - THE ORISHAS (Contd.).

Among gods of somewhat less importance than those already described, the following may be noticed:-

OKE. Oké (i.e. "mountain") is "god of the hills", and is worshipped by dwellers in rocky, or hilly country. He is feared, because he is credited (if neglected) with rolling down rocks on the dwellings of those who have not been giving him worship and sacrifices. Should a severe landslip occur, this is equivalent to a demand for human sacrifice. The fall of a boulder is a sure sign that he is needing some attention or gift. His emblem is a stone, or fragment of rock. The most notable of his shrines is the sacred rock Olumò in Abeokuta. It contains a big cave wherein early refugees from the slave-raiders found a shelter, and around which, as their numbers increased, they built dwellings and formed new townships. The name Olumò (Oluwa m̀ò ̀p) signifies "The Lord built it". Abe-okuta means "under the rock", this name being given because of the town's position. There is a tradition that if ever the Egbas (i.e. people of Abeokuta) should be defeated in war, they could retire into this cave, which would automatically close and keep them safe until all danger was past. Oké is regarded as the tutelary deity of the town of Ibadan, which is built on two hills. He is a farm-god, secondary to Orishako, and similar orgies used to be practised at the annual festivals of each of these.

OSHOSI. Oṣosi, another child of Yemaja, is, as previously mentioned, a secondary deity of hunters. He is a brother of Ògún, but seems to be exclusively a god of the chase. He dwells in the forest and aids hunters by driving the game into their pitfalls and snares. He also protects his devotees from being injured by beasts of prey. He is represented in human form, armed with a bow.

AJÉ-SHALUGÀ. This deity is the god of wealth, although Èshu (the devil, who is not an "orisha") would seem to dispute that position with him. Bishop Crowther gives us the proverb "Ajé-shalugà often passes by the first caravan (or person) as it comes to market, and loads the last with blessings"- i.e. "the race is not always to the swift".¹ Another proverb says, "he who when walking finds a cowrie is favoured by Ajé-Shalugà". Probably it would be more correct to describe him as the "god of good luck". The large cowrie is his emblem. The word ajé (high intonation) meaning "money", is not to be confounded (as by Dennett) with àjé, "witchcraft", nor with aje (middle intonation) which signifies "trial by ordeal of water". Ajé-Shalugà, like Oké and Orishako, is a farm-god. He is also the god of colour. As the staple dye of the country is produced from the indigo plant, and the highly valued purple alâri dye is also a vegetable product, it is easy to see why he is a farm-god.

DADA is the god of vegetables, and also of new-born children. He is reputed to be the first-born of the thirteen orishas who came from the body of Yemaja. He is then the "god of natural production" (Ellis). He is represented by a calabash ornamented by cowrie-shells and surmounted by a ball of indigo.

We now notice a group of water-deities, all more or less local:-

OLOKUN. Okun is "sea", or "ocean", and Olokun is therefore "Owner (or lord) of the sea". Therefore his worship is seldom found, except on, or near, the coast. He is the god of the fishermen and all who "go down to the sea... and do business in the great waters" - although the Africans have no sea-going ships, but only canoes for coastwise work, which they handle with the greatest dexterity, and in which the fishermen venture far out to sea, sometimes even out of sight of land. There is always a more or less heavy "surf" along the West Coast, and nothing of the nature of a harbour for over 1,000 miles between Sierra Leone and Lagos; consequently landing through the surf is always an exciting experience, and not infrequently highly dangerous. Olokun is not the sea itself, regarded as a god, but its presiding deity. He is supposed to be of human form, black in colour, and with long flowing hair. He is not solitary, but dwells in his palace beneath the waters, attended by a multitude of lesser spirits of the sea, some in human shape, others fish-like. When rough seas are experienced and the surf is bad, "Olokun is angry" and must be appeased by sacrifices, usually animals; but in prolonged rough weather human sacrifices have been offered. Evidences of these, even after the British government was established in Lagos, have been found in that colony, victims being kidnapped, beheaded, and thrown into the surf at night, by people of the Isaleko quarters.

Par. Various mythical stories are current concerning Olokun.

Ellis gives an interesting one, --- another of the several Deluge stories, (which a well-known writer has said are "not to be found in Africa") as follows:-

"Olokun, being enraged with mankind because of their neglect of him, endeavoured to destroy all of them, by overflowing

the land.¹ He had destroyed large numbers, when Ọbátálá interfered to save the remainder, forced Olokun back to his palace, and bound him in seven iron chains until he promised to abandon his design."

The entrance to the lagoon at Lagos (the seaport of Yorubaland) being partially closed by a bar of sand (on which many vessels have been wrecked) is credited with having its own deity, a goddess named Olokun-su, or Elusu, she being a wife of Olokun. Unlike her husband, she is white in colour, and, although of human shape, is covered from her breasts to the hips with fish scales. The fish of the bar are sacred to her, so that if any luckless fishermen invade her domain she upsets their canoes and drowns them. She is supposed to dwell in the bar. As the bar (which formerly was covered with water to a depth of ten feet or so, where the channel was deepest) has now been dredged to allow deep-sea liners to enter the lagoon, it would be interesting to know what has become of the goddess! Other wives of Olokun are Ọlọsa, the lagoon-goddess and the river Sapoba.

ỌLỌSA. Lagos is an island situated in a lagoon, which is part of a network of waters, extending east and west for

¹. "The fountains of the great deep were broken up."
Genesis, vii. 11.

A MANGROVE SWAMP

This is the junction of one of the many creeks of the Ogun river with the Lagos lagoon.

hundreds of miles, parallel with the ocean. The lagoon (in Yoruba osa, pronounced 'aw-sah') is presided over by the goddess Olqsa ("owner of the lagoon") who, like Olokun, is a child of Yemaja.. Yemaja, we have seen, is goddess of waters generally, and especially of the river Ogun, so that, as its waters flow into the Lagoon, and on into the ocean, the maternal deity is ministering to her offspring. Olqsa is not only the sister, but also the chief wife of Olokun. Like her husband, she has long hair. Unlike her sister of the harbour-bar, instead of keeping the fish as her own, she supplies them to her worshippers, and is therefore pre-eminently a fisherman's deity. Temples in her honour are placed along the shores of the lagoon, where offerings of fowls, sheep etc., are laid down. As these are devoured by crocodiles, those reptiles are called her messengers, and are supposed to convey to her the sacrifices which they consume, just as, in the case of sacrifices inland, the vultures which devour them are regarded as eye orisha,="the orisha's birds." Certain crocodiles, distinguished by particular marks, are specially venerated and are accommodated with sheds, purposefully erected for them, and covered with roofs thatched with palm leaves, or grass. Offerings of food are made to them every fifth day (Yoruba reckoning, which counts both the terminus a quo and the terminus ad quem: - European reckoning would be "every 4 days"). Ellis says "many of them become sufficiently tame to come for the offering as soon as they see, or hear, the worshippers gathering on the bank." These must be exceptions. The writer's experience is that both in the lagoon and in the rivers these creatures are extremely timid, and even when devouring food on a sand-bank, forsake it and slip back into the water the moment a canoe appears.

QYA. This goddess has been mentioned as the favourite and most faithful wife of Shango. Her name is the same as that of the great river Niger, except that it is usual in the case of the latter to prefix the word Odo, so that Odo-Qya is "the River of Qya." It has been suggested that on the death of her husband she went north and wept so copiously that her tears formed the original source of the river! She has a messenger, Qefe (probably the same as Afe, "a gentle breeze"). At Lokoro, near to Port Novo, there is a temple dedicated to Qya, the image of which has eight heads surrounding the chief head. This doubtless represents the splitting up of the river to form its Delta, before flowing into the ocean. Her special beads are a dark red, but must not be confused with those of Eshu, which are somewhat similar.

QSHUN. The second of Shango's three river-wives is Qsun (pronounced "Aw-shung"). This river, rising in the Ilesha country, flows from the north, to the eastward of Ibadan, into the lagoon. As in the case of Qlōsa, the lagoon-goddess, Qshun likewise has sacred crocodiles bearing special marks. Curiously enough, although this river is distant from Abeokuta, many of the Egbas worship Qshun, and may be seen wearing her distinctive necklace of transparent amber-coloured beads.

QBA has already been mentioned as the third wife of Shango. She is goddess of the river which bears her name, flowing eastward of Ibadan towards the lagoon.

ÀRQNI. This god is a wood-sprite. Bishop Crowther calls him "a fairy, an elf, supposed to have but one leg." He is also reported to have the head and tail of a dog, but otherwise to be of human form. His dominion is the forest, and he seizes all whom he meets. Those who endeavour to flee from him he devours; but he loves courageous persons, and if a man faces him boldly he leads him to his abode in the thickest fastnesses of the forest, and entertains him as his guest for several months, during which time he initiates him into the secrets of the various plants, and teaches him their medicinal uses. When his student has learned all there is to be learned, Àrqnì gives him a hair of his own tail as his diploma in proof of his graduation in this school of medicine, and sends him back to the haunts of men. The murmuring of the wind through the trees and the whirling of dead leaves by the breeze are tokens of his presence and energy.

AJA is a goddess of a similar character to Àrṣṣi, but more beneficent. She also carries off persons into the depths of the forest, and gives them a course of instruction in the medicinal value of herbs; but, unlike her professional brother, she never harms anyone. Bishop Crowther describes her as "a fairy, said to be of diminutive form, who carries persons into the wilderness and instructs them in magic and all kinds of medicines".

OYE is the god of the "harmattan", a dry sirocco wind, which comes down from the Sahara each morning at a certain season of the year, bearing a very fine dust, which appears as a mist until the wind dies away, when the dust settles on everything and intense heat follows. This god is supposed to live in a cave to the north of Ilṣṣin, though some say that he dwells on the mountain Igbṣṣi, where Eshu (or Èlṣṣba) is supposed to have his habitation.

OSUMARE. This deity is the rainbow, and is supposed to be a great snake, dwelling within the earth, who comes up at times to drink water from the sky. A variety of python, called erè, is said to be his messenger, and so is sacred to him. Ellis tells us that this god is also sacred to the Ewe-speaking tribes of Dahomey, by whom he is called Anyiewo.

QSÀNYÍN is the god of medicine, i.e., remedial physic. He is applied to in cases of sickness, so that his worship is very general. His figure is that of a bird placed on a metal bar. The chiefs have generally several staves, of ornamental metal. These are sent by the hands of messengers as a sign of their authority. If a chief wished for the aid of the writer in a case of sickness, he would send a trusted messenger bearing one of these staves, and sometimes the staff would be one which bore the figure of the bird as mentioned above. The illustration is a photograph of a metal staff actually sent on such an occasion.

OLAROSA is the tutelary deity of houses. He is represented by a stick, or sword, and his special duty is to drive away those who practise witchcraft, and all kinds of evil spirits, and particularly to keep Eshu from entering in.¹

OLORI-MERIN. The meaning of this name is "the owner of the four heads". The figure is regarded as the protector of towns, and may be represented merely by a hillock or artificial mound. A sacrifice used to be offered to it, every three months, of a new-born child only three or four days old. The mother had to be present, while its throat was cut by a priest, who caught its blood in a calabash and placed it on the top of the mound. The body was cut into small pieces and buried in the mound (Ellis.) The time of this cruel sacrifice was well named Ejegoun-- "Season of blood." The four heads watched the four points of the compass, or "four winds," from the top of the mound, and so preserved the town from pestilence and from war. The figure had the feet and legs of a goat, and was supposed sometimes to appear at night in the form of a serpent. --- Dennett rightly points out that Olori-merin is "not in itself an Orisha, but merely a Juju, (or "Fetich") representing the four great Orishas," giving as his authority the Babalawo Olitiyan.

CHAPTER VI.

THE OBJECTS OF BELIEF.- (C) THE SPIRITS OF THE DEAD.

Among the Yorubas, as generally among the West African negro tribes, there are several forms of Spirit-worship, which are ^{all} totally distinct from Orisha-worship. This has not been sufficiently recognized by former writers and considerable confusion has resulted; e.g., Dennett says "Iro, Oro, Egun, Egungun, and Eleko¹ are all now Orishas representing the spirits of their ancestors," - whereas, as a matter of fact, none of them is an "Orisha".

All the forms of worship comprised under this heading are concerned only with the "ghosts", or departed spirits, of human beings. Repeated enquiries by the writer have always elicited the reply that none of them is an "orisha".

All these forms are kept strictly secret from the women. When the writer lived in the country, any woman known to have discovered the secret of the worship of Oro, Egungun, or Eluku, was put to death without mercy. For this reason, no missionary dared to publish any particulars of these things. It is only since British government was instituted throughout the whole area, that it has become safe to publish them. Each form, or cult, is connected with a particular secret society, and the chief forms, as Orò in Abeokuta, Egungun in Ibadan, ^{and} Elukú in Ijebu, are connected with the executive government of the country. Besides having this influence in the political sphere, they also exercise their office in the social circle, when death enters the family, and through their office not only is the body of the deceased interred, but his spirit is supposed to be escorted safely to the abode of the dead, and in this connection we find the worship of ancestors, to a limited extent.

ORÒ. The supreme power in the worship of the spirits of the dead is Orò, especially among the Egbas, whose capital is Abeokuta. As in the case of many orishas, various conjectures have been made as to the meaning of the name. The simplest solution is the best, viz:—that the term is onomatopœic. The origin of this cult is obscure. There are, of course, certain myths which are offered to the curious for their acceptance, but none of them is worthy of much credence. The simplest explanation, and perhaps the most reliable, is that the Hausa people used the "bull-roarer" to scare the birds away from their farms, and the ingenious Yoruba adopted it as a form of spirit-worship. It is, how(ever)

~~ever~~, remarkable that we find this instrument used in connection with spirit-worship in various countries of the world;¹ but probably it is nowhere in such constant use as among the Egbas of Abeokuta, where it is heard on most nights of the year. The instrument as used by the Yorubas is a wooden lath varying in size from 6 inches in length, by $\frac{3}{4}$ inch broad, to 2 feet 6 in. in length, by 4 inches in breadth. The larger sizes are generally somewhat oval in form, and slightly rounded on one side, while nearly flat on the other. The edges are not serrated, nor (as a rule) are there any special marks, or designs, engraved on it, as in the case of the churinga of the Australian aborigines. The lath is perforated at one end, through which a string is passed, varying in length from six feet up to ten yards. In the case of the small and the medium sized lath, or "oro-stick", the cord is attached at the other end to ^a somewhat flexible rod, or wand, 6 feet or more in length, so that the instrument is raised in the air when in use.. The cord of the large powerful ones is attached, at the end remote from the lath, to a ball of cloth, grass or string, which is held in the hands of the operator. The small instrument is called Ìshẹ (i.e., "trouble") and the large one Àgbé, (i.e. "a sword") signifying the "trouble" which Oro brings to evil-doers, and the "sword" wherewith he beheads criminals. The small instrument gives a high, shrill note; but the pitch can be made to vary greatly according to the speed at which it is made to revolve round the operator. The length of the cord also affects the pitch, -- the bigger the circle described, the deeper is the tone produced. It is impossible to realize, without having experienced it, how intensely weird and awe-inspiring a thing it is, to lie awake in the stillness of the night and to hear the deep booming of a full-sized "bull-roarer" drawing nearer, until at last the noise is deafening in intensity, and the air above and around one's dwelling seems to be full of the agonized cries of a host of doomed spirits. While the small instrument can be played by small boys, and in the present day is in some parts even so used as a toy, the whole strength of a most powerful and experienced man is required to swing the full-sized one. The writer has seen such a player, bent double, the sweat pouring off him, as he, describing a huge circle of which he was ~~in~~ the centre, kept his body rotating by moving his feet with dancing steps, while he kept the "Oro" revolving round him about two feet off the ground. It is possible to swing the instrument without producing any audible sound. The secret of producing the note is that the lath must rotate on its own axis at the same time that it is revolving in a circle. This is effected by getting a twist on the string, which, when once started, will be maintained automatically. The Oro-stick is correctly swung "clock-wise", never (by a Yoruba) anti-clockwise. There is no warrant for the suggestion of Col. Ellis that Oro-worship is of a phallic nature, or that the instrument itself is a representation of this. Although Dennett follows the colonel in this opinion, he admits that repeated enquiries on this point produced indignant denials from natives of the country. These writers jump to their conclusion from the fact that among certain other tribes (distinctly lower in the scale of civilization) of West Africa, initiation of youths into similar societies is connected with their arrival at the age of puberty. But the Yorubas are distinctly higher, both intellectually and morally, than the surrounding nations, and (while it must be admitted that in certain cults the grosser side of heathenism is painfully evident) it is unjust, unfair, unnecessary and unscientific to impute to them a degree of degeneration to which other tribes have fallen, but of which they themselves deny the experience.

The Power of Oro. While Oro may be played by any person of the male sex, of any age, at such times as the spirit is allowed to be "out," the name strictly belongs to a most powerful secret society, which is the executive government of the Egbas. The seat of government is in Abeokuta, of which the head is ^{the} Alaké, or King, next to whom are three chiefs; - the Nlado, or "head civil-chief," the Jaguna, or head "war-chief" and executioner, and the Mogeje or "heir." The council, or senate, is known as the Ogboni, or "elders." These sit in council on all matters connected with the welfare of the town, and judge serious cases of misdemeanour. Their session is accompanied by spirit-drinking and by drumming, - the "Ogboni drum". When the members of the council are coming out into the street, the "Ogboni" note is sounded, and a loud-voiced crier proclaims a warning "Hē-e-e-pa! Ogboni!" whereupon all uninitiated men, and all women, flee into the compounds, for if they encountered the Ogboni, they would be punished by beating, or fine, and sometimes (in olden times) even by death. The Ogboni council is closely connected with Oro. If its members are judging a criminal case and decide that the culprit is to be condemned to death, he is "handed over to Oro." If members of the Oro-guild are present, the note of the "Ogboni-drum" is then and there changed to that of the "Oro-drum", and the warning is given "He-pa! Ō-o-o-ro!"

VICTIMS OF ORO

All women must instantly flee into the houses, for none may see Oro, under pain of death. Sufficient time having been given for the women to hide, the Oro-party comes out, playing its instrument, and goes to the house of the condemned person to arrest him. He is then led out into the bush, to be put to death, which is said to be often after terrible torture. There are certain groves sacred to Oro. No uninitiated person may enter these, under pain of death. The execution of the criminal takes place within one of these groves by beheading. The fate of the criminal is published to the world, as a warning to evil-doers, by his head being nailed to a tree in a market-place, or some other public position, -- this is done at night, when none but the Oro-party see the transaction. Or, he is "carried off by Oro," both body and soul, and neither the living man, or his lifeless corpse, is ever seen again; but his clothes, or part of them, may be seen in a tree, where they have been torn from him as Oro carried him away through the air. This punishment is spiritual, as well as physical, for it is believed that the spirit of a dead person cannot get safely to the realms of the departed, until the corpse is buried with due rites. Those who are thus punished become Eru-Orò, i.e. slaves of Oro, perpetually restless spirits.

Oro may also be employed as an instrument of banishment. If it is deemed necessary to expel some "undesirable" from the country and the way is not easy, the authorities put the matter into the hands of Oro. An "Oro confinement" is proclaimed for a stated period. During the time that it prevails, the Oro parties surround the house of the individual and play their instruments, perhaps giving out also weird cries. They then conduct him away to the bush and "his (?) voice" is heard, far off from the town. He is never seen again and is said to be "banished by Oro" + inwon fi Orò le e nilu (i.e., "They with Oro drive him from the town").

As a general rule, Oro may come out any night, between sunset and sunrise. For this reason, women dare not venture out of doors in Abeokuta¹ except in daylight. During the day he may only come out in emergencies, as noted above, to arrest any special criminal, or when a "confinement" has been officially proclaimed. Twice during the writer's sojourn in Abeokuta a "nine-days' confinement" was ordered. Every house, that had any window looking on to the street, had to have every such window covered by mats, and the door of every house, or/or compound, had to be kept closed; for no woman (under pain of death) might be seen from the street, or be able to see into the street. When the writer had left the town, during one of these confinements, for a journey to the further interior, his child (under a year old) was taken by the senior missionary into the street to "see Oro"! The Oro party surrounded him and with the greatest concern demanded "Okonrin ni, tabi obirin?" i.e. "Is it man or woman?" - "What does it matter?" said the missionary, "It is only a baby, under a year old, and cannot take any notice, or remember what it sees!" -- "Oh; but we must know. If a woman, it must die". ---"Ah, well, do not distress yourselves, for it is a man!" - "O dara! ("It is good") now we are satisfied, and he may see Oro, since he is a man!" Any woman who saw Oro played, or confessed that she knew how the noise was produced, was in the olden days put to death without mercy. But, if she saw the Oro-stick lying in a house, and, on being asked what it was, replied "Only a bit of wood; it is nothing more," she would probably escape. These lengthy confinements were generally ordered when specially evil deeds were to be done. After they were concluded, dead bodies would be found in the bush, victims of human sacrifice (not publicly offered), or objects of the vengeance of (probably) some person, or persons, in authority.

They/were

They were also used in past years to provide an opportunity of sending away slave-caravans, consisting of townspeople who had been kidnapped by the marauding bands (or "war-boys") of the chiefs of the town. The so-called "inter-tribal wars" were kept up continually as an excuse for this kidnapping, and frequently chiefs set their war-boys to kidnap the people of their own town, whom they were in office to protect! On one occasion a man from a neighbouring township, who had been thus kidnapped and escaped, complained to the chief. Several chiefs were sitting in council when this man's case was heard. "Who is the man who caused you to be caught?" -- he was asked. "I do not know him," he replied, "but they call him M-----". The man thus named was one of those hearing his case! His fellow-chiefs smiled slightly, but no reply was made. On one occasion, this same chief had a large number of such captives shut up, waiting for an opportunity to sell them into slavery to another tribe (their reputed enemies), when a great fire broke out, and his premises were threatened. His servants begged him to allow these victims to be brought out; but he refused, and caused them all to perish, in order that not one should escape to testify against^{him.} ----- During these confinements, men are to/

to be seen playing the oro-stick (or "bull-roarer") all over the town; many of them being more or less drunk, and in addition to this the Oro-king¹ and his wife (both being men) come out in state. It will be seen from the accompanying photograph that, although they wear wooden masks, etc., the whole person is not concealed, thus differing from the eguns, to be described shortly.

After the death of any important person, very much "Oro" is heard at night, and after such a visit, or after an "Oro confinement", one or more trees will be seen, from which all the branches have been cut off, and at the top of the tree a white flag, or cloth, has been placed. In cases of special importance the cloth is stretched from the top of one tree to the top of another near at hand. Sometimes other articles, such as mats, gin bottles, or demijohns, or old clothes, are seen fastened to the stumps of the branches. This is called the ceremony of Oro pagi, or Oro jęgi; ("Oro kills the tree" or "Oro eats the tree"). Every leaf and every young shoot has entirely disappeared from the tree. These are supposed to have been entirely eaten up by the spirit of/

of the recently deceased person, who has now become deified. This ceremony always takes place at night, and is never allowed to be seen by any person who has not been initiated as a member of the secret society of Oro. A proverb says, A ki ri ajeju Oro, i.e. "No one ever sees that which is devoured by Oro".¹ Other ceremonies connected with Oro-worship are (1) Igba Irana, a calabash ceremony to get a troublesome spirit (manes) out of a dwelling-house, and (2) the Ipade ceremony (originally connected specially with hunters) to remove the spirit, whose worn-out garments, cap, etc., are removed to a place outside the town, a clay figure of the deceased sometimes being set up with them.²

EGUNGUN, which is pronounced "Eh-gung-gung", and frequently contracted into Ēgun, signifies "bone" or "skeleton". An ēgun is supposed to be the spirit of a deceased person, who has returned to earth. It is absolutely essential that not a single particle of the human form should be visible, for, if this rule is

1. Col. Ellis says that the rock Olumo in Abeokuta is "sacred to Oro and none may ascend it". It is true that much Oro-worship takes place on this rock, but the statement that none may ascend it is not correct. The colonel was never in Abeokuta, but the writer lived there and has ascended and crossed over the said rock.

EGUNS IN ABEOKUTA

broken, the man wearing the dress must die (presumably as being an impostor!), and every woman present must likewise die. In some parts of the country, the dress may be made of grass, and a wooden mask worn. This is the case in the Benin country, where there is a similar performance called Ovia. In the Niger delta, these figures are called Maws, and are generally entirely swathed in mats. But, as will be seen from the accompanying photo,—taken by the writer in Abeokuta,—in that town, and in Yorubaland generally, the dress is made entirely of native cotton cloth, and made up into one garment, including the head-piece, which has perforations in the face, or veil, through which the man within can see out. An Egun invariably carries a whip, or long flexible wand, with which he drives people away. Eguns may come out freely in the day-time, and do so singly, or in small companies. They walk, leap, dance in grotesque fashion, and run after people and frighten them. They are generally attended by one or more "followers", in ordinary human form. The Egun sometimes utters strange cries, and invariably talks a great deal, but his speech is always in "Egun-voice", which is of a deep ventriloquial tone. In all his antics, the Egun has to be extremely careful not to touch any other person. Should he do so, ever so slightly, (e.g., if the wind caused his garment to barely touch the garment of any ordinary man, woman, or child) he would be put to death, together with the person, (man or woman) whom he touched/touched, or by whom he was touched, and so also would every woman present. The same penalty would be inflicted on him, if any accident to his dress during his "dancing" revealed any portion of his body, while any woman was present. The extreme jealousy with which the secret, that the "spirit" was only a man dressed up, was guarded is shewn by the following two incidents:-

On one occasion an Egun who was dancing in Abeokuta in the presence of a crowd, which contained a large number of woman, had the misfortune to tear his clothes. He was killed, and every woman present was taken and also put to death. The horror produced by this event was so great that Egun-worship was never again permitted in the particular township where it occurred.

At another time, when the seaport of Lagos alone was a British colony, and the rest of the country entirely under native government, two Eguns were dancing in the streets of Lagos, and some trouble occurred for which they were arrested and brought into the court. The presiding magistrate insisted that they should uncover their heads and show their faces. Among the spectators in the court were two girls from Abeokuta, who, when they returned home, told their brother/brother "we are no longer afraid of the Eguns, for we have seen and learned what they are," stating how they had made the discovery. The brother (possibly fearing for his own safety if it were discovered that he knew and did not report this) informed the chiefs, and the two girls were put to death.

The Egun-dance, however, is regarded as a piece of fun and is greatly enjoyed, certainly by the men. These "spirits", having frightened the market women from their stalls, help themselves (in their own persons, or through their followers) to the commodities exposed for sale. They do not resent questioning, or even a moderate amount of "chaff"; but no disrespect must be shown to them by, or in the presence of, women. One morning the late Rev. T. Harding was passing through a certain township and encountered an Egun, who was entertaining the crowd. He saluted the "spirit", È kú owurò ò! Òjìrè? i.e., "Good morning! Do you wake well?" The Egun fell into the trap; giving the customary reply A dupe i.e., "We give thanks!" The missionary, with a smile, said to the people, "Spirits do not sleep!" Missionaries have always to act tactfully, striking the happy mean between needlessly offending the people on the one hand, and (countenancing/countenancing false beliefs on the other, so that, while treating the Eguns with courtesy, as any other person, and avoiding anything that might endanger the life of any one, it was essential to avoid any appearance of fear of these beings. Late one afternoon, shortly before sunset, as the writer and his wife were coming along a narrow road, with a wall on the right hand, and a bank of earth on the left, they met an Egun, behaving in a very blustering manner. They were within 100 yards, or so, of their Mission House, from the verandah of which two of the native maids were looking on. These exclaimed in terror, "Oh! Missis will be killed." It was necessary to go on, or turn back (as if in fear) and endeavour to reach home by a long detour. The writer said "Show no fear. We will go straight on; but be careful not to touch him. He will give way to us." When the respective parties were within about two yards of each other, the Egun, gracefully sat down on the bank, at the left hand. The writer thanked him and gave him a courteous salutation to which he as courteously (but in "Egun-voice") replied. ~~Due~~ care was, of course, taken to allow sufficient space between the clothes of the "spirit" and the oniwasu, i.e. "Missionary."

It will be recognised that while women may look on freely at Egun performances they must be (at least apparently/apparently) in complete ignorance of the deceit practised on them. Not only must they not by sight, or touch, prove that the ~~vision~~ vision is other than a disembodied spirit; they must not even laugh at him, or show him any disrespect, still less say that he is only a man in disguise.

In June of each year the Annual Egun festival is held, for seven days. It is the Yoruba "All Souls" festival, when mourning is repeated for all those who have died during the last few years. Egungun is specially powerful in Ibadan, even as Oro is in Abeokuta.

Under certain conditions the Egun need not be dressed up; but this is only when he is quite hidden from view by other circumstances. A curious and uncommon example of this, which the writer only once experienced, was as follows:-

In 1894 Mr & Mrs Farrow and two single lady missionaries (new recruits to the Mission) were stationed at Kudeti, a township in Ibadan. Their mission-house was close to the boundary wall of a compound which also contained the houses of a school-master, a catechist, and the Rev. D. Olubi, an elderly native clergyman, who had come to Ibadan from Abeokuta many years previously/previously with the Rev. D. Hinderer. One night, somewhere about mid-night, the missionaries were awakened by an awful voice, and appalling groans, which came (apparently) from the spot immediately below the windows of the Mission House. Their first thought, on awakening, was that some terrible murder must be taking place and an appeal being made for help; but the writer soon recognized the "Egun-voice" and was able to make out what was said.---

One of the young recruits confessed next morning that she had been terrified, fearing that a madman had escaped and was trying to force his way into the mission house.--- This nocturnal visitor was really a "night-egun," who took up a position under the wall of the mission compound, just outside the Mission house, and, pretending that he was the spirit of a man who had been a friend and companion of Mr. Olubi in the days of his heathen condition in Abeokuta, now proceeded to "salute" him, expecting an answer in the way of a present, and ridiculing and chaffing him with having become a Christian for the sake of worldly advantage. This one-sided conversation was as follows:- (loudly, in "Egun-voice")-"Olubi! ~~je~~! Olubi--- (Olubi!!)"

THE ADAMU-ORISHA.

Olubi!" (pause). "Olubi - E_kú_ati_jo!" (salutation - "after a long absence." - several times repeated, with pauses, interspersed with frightful groans). "Olubi! I haven't seen you for a long time! - Why don't you answer me? - You've done a jolly good thing for your-self, haven't you? - Fine thing to be an onigbagbo, (i.e. "a believer") isn't it?" (groans, ad lib. & pauses) - "Why don't you answer me (i.e. "come out and give me a present")?" This went on for a considerable space of time, something between half an hour and an hour, until the disappointed and disgusted "spirit", after a final outburst of groans, retired and went back to "spirit-land" (or to his sleeping-mat)!

There is in Lagos a similar society to that of the Egungun, called Adamu-orisa (adamu = "confusion", "a mistaken view", or "heresy"), which seems to denote that this society can confound and overcome the orishas. The dress is not in one piece. It comprizes a large gown, sewn native fashion with very long and wide sleeves, a long white veil, and a broad-brimmed hat, also an Aropale, - a piece of strong cloth to rub the earth with. A special wand (white) is carried, which is constructed hollow with innumerable cross bars within. It is partially filled with seeds, so that, as the wand is turned, or even slightly agitated with either end uppermost, a weird, rustling sound is produced, which, of course, is to be regarded as the voice of "spirits." Some think that this Adamu-orisha is merely a localized form of the Elukú of Ijebu, described in the following paragraph. It takes the form of a play and its object is to lay the corpse (and thereby the spirit) of a deceased person.

ELUKÚ. Elukú is another secret society connected with spirit-worship, practised to some extent in Abeokuta, but with much less frequency than Oro, or Egungun. The real home of Elukú is the Ijebu country, where it possesses the same executive power as Oro in Abeokuta, and Egun in Oyo and Ibadan; hence the proverb:-

i.e., "Oyo has the Egun cult; Egba has the Oro cult; Ijebu has the Agemo cult" --- Agemo being a materialized form of Elukú.

par: The name Elukú signifies "You must beat him to death," in reference to its executionary power in punishing criminals. Elukú only comes out at night, and is "heard"; but not "seen", except by the initiated; or by others at their peril. Great secrecy was formerly observed concerning it, and the writer could get very little information concerning this cult. One usually well-informed and accurate enquirer into the religion of/

of his people said that Èlukú was "extremely wicked", and so powerful that "even Oro must go in if Èlukú comes out." Others say that Èlukú must hide from Oro. Certain it is that the two were never both heard at the same time. Èlukú announces his presence by a most unearthly shriek, somewhat sustained, which is produced by the mouth of a highly trained performer, as some say, "by means of ²leaf in the mouth," as in the case of the Calabar Egbo. It can be heard at a very great distance. The pseudonymous writer "Adesola," who has written a series of articles on Yoruba burial customs in the Nigerian Chronicle, says that "Eluku is the Oro of the Ijebus", that it came from Iraye, and that its presiding spirit, or deity, is descended from the royal house of Oniloku, which is the state title of the monarch of Iraye.

Par. The social office of Èlukú (as of Oro and Egun) is to conduct funeral rites. These are performed on the third, seventh and fourteenth days after the death. The seventh is the great day. The coffin, with the corpse, or bones, of the deceased, or a bare plank to represent the same, is placed, an hour after sunset, in a well-lighted compound, and the spirit is invoked, and questions asked and answered about him. This chorus is sung,

J'epo l'aiye ô!

J'epo l'aiye ô!

B'ai ijeje l'orun, a kò mò,

Şe rē l'aiye ô!

B'ai serē l'orun, a kò mò.

that is:--

"Eat richly in this world!

We know not whether there is eating in heaven.

Do well in this world!

We know not whether there is well-doing in heaven."

Sacrifices are offered, the deceased is again invoked, and responds (!) in the loud cries of Ẹlukú. On the fourteenth day his shrine is fixed.

The political aspect of Ẹlukú is prominent in the Annual Festival. Late at night his cries are heard and a song sung which is most terrifying, describing the deity in his office of executioner. But he blesses his worshippers in a verse written in dactylic measure, of which the translation is,---

"My child, my child, long life to thee,

Coupled with health!

A parent thou'lt be

Of living sons and fruitful daughters."

In the Niger delta district there is a similar society/

society called Egbo,¹ the members of which produced a similar unearthly shriek to that of Elukú by means of a leaf in the mouth. As in the case of Oro and Elukú, women and uninitiated men must keep out of the way of Egbo.

AGEMO. Agemo is the materialized form of the Elukú spirit of deceased parents or ancestors. The name signifies "able to change form", and so is also the word for a chameleon. The agemo is properly a circular object, about three feet in height, and with a radius of from 18 to 24 inches. It is open at the top; but no inquisitive gaze is permitted, as the figure is entirely surrounded by old men, who are themselves enveloped in mats. It seldom issues out from its own grove. When it does so, it plays and whirls itself about. Even chiefs do obeisance (dobale) to it, and women (keeping a great way off) likewise prostrate themselves sideways (yinrinka) this being the African curtsy. There is a feathered agemo, known as the Oniwuruwuru.²

ABÍKÚ. Abíkú (from bí, "to beget", & kú, "to die") is connected with the death of children, who die before reach-reaching the age of puberty. As infant mortality is terribly high, this cult has great influence. The term includes the spirits of those who die in childhood, and, also, the class of evil spirits which causes their death. Only one abíkú can take possession of a child. He is checked by the jealousy of his fellow abíkús, who only allow him to enter on condition that he shares the child's food, etc., with them. The insatiable demands of these outside spirits cause the emaciation and ultimate death of the child. To guard against this danger, iron rings, waist belts, anklets and wristlets of beads, and other charms are put upon the young children from their earliest days.¹ Should these fail to keep away the abíkús, cuts are made in the child's skin, and chillie peppers are rubbed in to torture the evil spirit out of the child. In the event of death being attributed to Abíkú the body was formerly thrown into the bush, or hacked to pieces to destroy the abiku.

CHAPTER VII.

THE OBJECTS OF BELIEF.- (D) THE DEVIL.

There is no orisha, properly so-called, that is commonly worshipped by all Yoruba pagans. A man, or woman, may worship one, or any number of such deities, or in a few cases (as previously mentioned) the individual may worship no orisha; but all, without exception, believe in, and pay at least some measure of worship, or reverence to Eṣu, i.e., "the devil". Although his worship is general throughout Yorubaland, it is particularly cultivated in the Ijesha and Ondo districts, and in the Benin country, and the tribes dwelling there have always been noted as the most wicked and cruel of all the Yoruba-speaking peoples. An Ijesha man, well-known to the writer, was named Èṣu-tó-sìn, which means "The devil is sufficient to worship".

The name Èṣu, or Èshu, comes from ṣù, ("to be, or become dark") and signifies "darkness", or "the dark one", i.e. "the prince of darkness". He is emphatically the supreme evil spirit, and (as such) is not taken into dwelling-houses, but has his shrine in the street. In some form or other, he is represented at the entrance to every town, compound or house. A proverb says "Èṣu kò ni ìwa; akọ ile rẹ si ita," i.e. "The devil has no character; (therefore) his house is made for him in the street." Another name by which he is frequently called is Elegbara or Elegba, an ambiguous title, which may mean either "the one who takes the body", or "the one who saves"; probably this name of double meaning is designedly given, so that, while the good meaning may please the spirit himself, the other may serve to warn mankind. Bishop Crowther in his Vocabulary simply gives, as its equivalent, "Satan, the god of mischief". Ellis describes him as the phallic god of the Yorubas; but this is not strictly correct.

Some forms of image, made to represent him, may appear to support this idea, but he may just as reliably be called the "god of wealth", because his wooden images are always adorned with strings of cowries, and cowries
(the native currency) are a constant offering to him
(cf. Pluto among the ancient Greeks). He is really the deity of supreme wickedness in all its forms, and another of his titles expresses this, viz: - Buruku - an intensely emphatic word for "Wicked", or "Evil", - buru (verb) = "to be bad", buburu (adjective) = "bad" but burukú (buru, and ikú (i.e. "death") = "wicked to death".

122a

A COMMON MUD IMAGE OF ESHU.

From this it is evident that the worship of Eshu originated from fear. He was regarded as the powerful spirit of evil, ever ready to do mischief, who must be appeased, and made at least non-malevolent towards his devotees. From this, however, it was not a very difficult process to go further and seek to induce him to exercise his great power in behalf of his worshippers. Thus we find that ⁱⁿ practice, he is not only offered propitiatory sacrifices, but he is prayed to and offered gifts, to secure his favour in conferring benefits upon those who serve him. So far is this carried, that it is sometimes said "There is a good Eshu and there is a bad Eshu", or "Eshu is not wholly bad", i.e. "not so black as he is painted!"

- Pan.* The devil is represented by images of different forms. (1). The correct and chief form, appearsto be a simple pillar of mud, slightly conical in form and adorned by three more or less rounded marks or the insertion of three shells instead. This, if in the open street, will be covered by a small shed thatched with ikin, or palm leaves.
- (2). The household Eshu must be always of mud and in human form. Another form is made of wood and more or less human in form. This is generally in a sitting position, with the hands resting on the knees, but sometimes sitting on its feet with flexed knees. Ellis says "Elegba ...

SHRINE OF ESHU - THE DEVIL

"Elegba ... is always represented naked, seated with his hands on his knees, etc.", but the fact is that he is not always so represented. The accompanying photograph taken by the writer, shews him represented by a wooden image, wearing a cloth covering his body, and adorned with strings of cowrie shells. This "devil-shrine" was very near to the mission house. It shows also cowrie shells which have been thrown down as an offering by passers-by. (3) Small wooden images are made to represent this evil deity, to which are attached leather loops, by which they may be carried when the owner is on a journey. Two illustrations are given of such, now in the writer's possession:-

(a). The first figure shows the devil in a kneeling posture, supporting with its hands breasts of a female type. The idea expressed is that this deity gives nourishment. It is to be noted that figures of the devil are always given hair dressed after the fashion of women. (Yoruba men almost invariably shave their heads, or are close-cropped). This might lead to the supposition that Eshu is regarded as a female personage, or that there is a male and a female devil. The truth is, however, that he is regarded as the one and only such being, and is always spoken of as "he"; but this does not preclude him from possessing certain feminine characteristics.

(b) The second image is a very small one, only three inches in height; but is of special interest, on account of the markings engraved upon it. This figure, below the breast, is not of human form, but merges into a square pillar. On three of its four sides are engraved two boards precisely similar to a Mohammedan writing tablet (wàlā). This, however, has nothing to do with the Islamic faith, but is the dévining board used by the babalawo, or Ifà priest, in consulting his deity. Thus it illustrates the connection between Ifà (the oracle) and Eshu (the prince of darkness), who gave to Ifà the clue, by which he might find out and reveal the dark or hidden things.¹ Again the number of lines on each side is symbolical, as were the cowrie strings which formed the necklace of the image. All numbers have symbolic meanings. Every odd number (except "one") has a bad meaning, and every even number a good one. Now Eshu's numbers are particularly five and seven, usually the latter, and so we find that the image had seven strings of seven cowries each. The number of lines engraved on the sides are likewise all uneven numbers. This image was formerly placed on a mat at the road-side. Sometimes Eshu is

This image normally has seven strings of cowrie shells round its body. Three have been removed from one side to show the engraved figures of divining tablets found on its two sides and back. simply represented by a rough stone on which the blood of sacrifices (e.g. fowls) is spilt. One such stone is in the writer's possession, and its former owner in giving it up to the writer (on ^{her} conversion to Christianity) told him it was dedicated to Eshu and had been so used. Its surface is covered with old blood stains.¹ Eshu, in consequence of the bargain he made with Ifà, receives a portion of the sacrifices offered to the other gods, some of the blood, at least, is poured out to him (as has been noted in the case of Ògún), before the victim is offered to the particular orisha who is invoked. It is supposed that, if he is not thus appeased with the first blood, he will prevent the orisha to whom the sacrifice is offered from accepting the same. This is another indication that Eshu stands apart from the Orishas and that he is regarded as a being superior to them in cunning and in power. The special victims offered to Eshu for his own sacrifices are cocks, dogs and he-goats. Ellis says that on "very important occasions a human victim is offered to him." This may have been the case in olden times, but the writer never knew of such being offered to Eshu.

Par: It is said that Eshu's chief place of abode is on a mountain, Igbeṭi by name, supposed to be situated near the Niger, where he has a large palace of brass, and keeps a large number of retainers. His special functions are, as we should expect, the working out of his character. His chief attributes are mischief, cunning and might. As mentioned above, he is worshipped to propitiate and placate him towards the worshipper. His aid is also invoked in behalf of the same worshipper, and this may be for the bestowal of some gift, through his power, or for injury to the worshipper's enemy. Again, because of his cunning and knowledge, he is frequently consulted as to the ordinary affairs of daily life. He can be consulted directly (without the aid of a babalawo) by his worshippers, with the saving of time and expense, and his answers are regarded as infallible. Sixteen cowrie shells are used as the instruments of divination in this case. No Yoruba man, or woman, having consulted Eshu, would dare to disregard the answer given by this oracle. A simple sacrifice, comprising at least palm-oil and very cold water, must be offered before the cowrie shells are cast in divination.

CHAPTER VIII.
MODES OF WORSHIP.

The pagan Yoruba is a very religious person. He renders worship to his deity, or deities, in various ways, both personally and in communion with others. Three days after birth, the new-born child is acknowledged by the father as his own, and Ifà is consulted, through the babalawo, and returns answer as to the orisha that the child is to worship, and the ewòs (or prohibitions) that it is to observe.¹ This orisha then becomes the tutelary god of the child, to be worshipped by him throughout his life. Seven days after the birth of a girl, nine days after that of a boy, the babalawo comes again, offers a sacrifice to Ifà and to the Olori (or indwelling spirit of the child's head - see Chapter X), sprinkles the child three times with a water of purification and thrice pronounces its name. The fire in the room is extinguished and its embers carried out. Thus we have a purification by sacrifice, water and fire.

PRAYER. The Yoruba heathen well illustrates the desire for God divinely implanted in the human heart.

A MID-DAY HALT ON THE RIVER OGUN

On rising from his sleeping mat in the early morning, he will speak to none, and engage in no work, until he has first "saluted" his orisha, thanking the god for protection and seeking his blessing for the new day. Thus daily private prayer is practised.

Par. Early one morning as the writer was travelling up the river Ogun by canoe, he saw a woman come down to the water-side, and salute the river. Entering the water until it covered her feet, she stood and recited prayers, then she advanced until her knees were covered, and, successively, her hips, and her body up the arm-pits, reciting more prayers at each stand. The canoe rounding a bend of the river, she was ^{soon} lost to view. She was doubtless a worshipper of Yemaja, the goddess of the said river. Each orisha has its own appointed sacred day for worship. It is said that some have a week of five days, and some a week of seventeen days. The Yoruba week is really, according to European reckoning, a week of four days; but the African includes the first day of the new week, and so calls it a week of five days. Each day of this four-day week is called by the name of one of the greater deities, and is sacred to his worship. The usual order is:-

and each of these deities in turn is said to be worshipped "every fifth day". Certain of the lesser deities may be worshipped on the same day as any of the greater ones. When one is said to be worshipped on every "seventeenth"^{day} (i.e. every sixteenth according to European reckoning), the significance is that he has one sacred day in every four "weeks".

Par. The ritual of the day includes the offering of the prescribed sacrifices, and often processions, with music and dancing, especially at the great festivals. The dancing is of a slow measured type, generally with symbolical steps, undulations and contortions of the body. The musical instruments are usually drums, bells, (of special pattern according to the orisha) and rattles. To the accompaniment of these instruments, native lyrics are sung in praise of the particular deity. Christian lyrics have been written in the same style, chiefly for evangelistic purposes, the poetic style and the accompanying melody being strictly African.^{1.}

SACRIFICE. The principle of sacrifice has two sides, the negative side of self-denial, and the positive side of offering, or oblation. Taboo in its religious aspects is a kind of negative sacrifice, a real denial of self in deference to the wish or decree of the deity. The Yoruba term for this is Èwò (pronounced "Eh-waw") and it holds a large place in, and exercises absolute sway over the life of every Yoruba heathen. Three days after birth, the Ifà priest not only declares what orisha is to be worshipped by the new-comer into the world, but also the four èwòs which he must always observe; viz:- (1) his own orisha (i.e. he is forbidden to marry a woman whose orisha is the same as his own); (2) an animal èwò; (3) a vegetable èwò; (4) an omen èwò (a rat, bird, or snake). These are his personal èwòs, of which he may never eat. In times of sickness, the patient often esteems it more urgent to find out his èwò in the disease than to receive the remedy. Then again each orisha has its special èwòs, i.e. things which must never be offered to it in sacrifice, not be partaken of by its worshippers.

Per. Offerings in sacrifice vary very greatly. Kola-nuts may be offered to every orisha, but in the case of Ọbàtálá, to whom everything of a red colour is èwò, (i.e. taboo), only the white (or "bitter") Kola may be offered. The ordinary (pink) kola is largely used for purposes of divination, but its chief use is to symbolize friendship, or purification after a quarrel or dispute. For this purpose the nut is split and partaken of by both (or all) parties concerned. Partaking of the nut in common is a sacred act of communion. To say "we have split the Kola" is to say "The dispute is over and we have become friends". Offerings of cowrie shells (currency) are constantly made to Eshu (Satan). Practically all kinds of food may be offered in sacrifice, and most kinds of living creatures, from reptiles up to man; but, among birds, the vulture (àkàlà) the turkey buzzard (gùnu-gùn) and the grey parrot (òfè) are ewò to all obishas; the green parrot (aganran) however may be offered. Palm-oil accompanies many sacrifices. Sacrifices are not offered promiscuously, or hap-hazard. There is a prescribed offering for each special purpose, e.g., "against death in sickness - a sheep; for longevity - a dog; for strength to the body - a ram sheep and a cock; against losses - a basket of eggs, most of which are usually employed with leaves sacred to Ifà; against being lied upon¹ - domestic pigeons and palm-nut shells; against trouble and misfortune - rats (i.e. bandicoots); against drought - male crabs, from which water drops each time one makes a leap; against a flood from incessant rain, or for confusion of a plot - snails; against a fire-accident - a wild-hog or a duck, with different kinds of Ifà leaves; for victory in time of war - a ram sheep and an old cock together; against the death of a very young child - a hen that had had chickens;

 to be permitted to come to a title, and for the destruction of a plot - a wild hog.¹

Par. At the offering of a special sacrifice, the priest (babalawo) indicates what is required. The worshippers prostrate themselves saying Tóto, totohûn, an abbreviation for Tóbôhûn, emi kò se bẹ mọ, i.e. "It is enough; never will I do so again." The priest intercedes for the worshippers, and points out ~~that~~ their humiliation and penitence. He then kills the sacrificial victim and pours out the blood on the ground. In some cases the head and entrails are exposed before the temple in a shallow earthen vessel. Sometimes in response to the appeal of the priest, an audible answer ("from the god!") is heard in a bird-like chirping twittering voice. Ellis suggests that this is the work of a hidden confederate with a blade of grass in his mouth! The carcasses of sacrifices are disposed of in various ways. In the Irapada (or Redemption Offering) the whole victim is burnt with fire, and, when consumed, the smouldering

ashes are quenched with water and then taken out and deposited on a public road, as is the case with all other offerings and gifts to Eshu.¹ Sometimes the victims are taken out of the town alive and "lost" in the bush, being supposed to bear away the sin, guilt and trouble of the offerer which had been transferred to them.² Or (with a similar intent) they may be thrown into a river, or the sea (if offered to Olokun), or buried in the earth. Some sacrifices (e.g. fowls offered to Ògún by hunters before starting on an expedition) are consumed by the offerers, but the blood must be first poured out. In other cases, the blood of the victim is sprinkled "on the two side posts and on the lintel" and on the door itself of the worshipper's house.³ Sometimes the carcass of the victim is thrown from priest to priest, from hand to hand, without being allowed to touch the ground.⁴ Sometimes the victims (especially young chickens) are taken out to some public road, and left to be devoured alive by beasts or birds of prey. Sometimes, again, the blood of the victim is streaked upon the head of the offerer to signify that he is the one for whom the propitiation is made.⁵

The supreme sacrifice of the Yorubas is, of course, the human sacrifice, but the offering of human victims seems never to have prevailed among the true Yorubas and Egbas to the appalling extent to which it was carried by the allied tribes of Ondo and Benin on the East, and the neighbouring people of Dahomey on the west. This was not (as one writer supposed) because the Yoruba Kings had less power than those of the peoples referred to; but was due to the fact that the Egbas and other true Yorubas never (as far as we can trace) sank to such a low level of degradation as the others. The practice did, however, prevail ^{to} a considerable extent; but is now, owing to the whole country being under the British government, strictly forbidden. In olden days there was an annual basket sacrifice in Abeokuta in which the victims, enclosed in baskets, were cast down from a height and despatched by clubs. In times of great urgency special human sacrifices were offered to Shango, Ifà, Ògún, or certain other deities. Such were often offered secretly at night, hence the saying "the night is bad". A human victim used to be offered annually to Elegbara (i.e. Èshu or "Satan") in Ondo, where (as mentioned above) devil-worship is particularly strong. Capt. John Adams, writing at the close of the 18th century, says of Lagos:-

Par: "The horrid custom of impaling alive a young female to propitiate the favour of the goddess presiding over the rainy season, that she may fill the horn of plenty, is practised here annually. The immolation of the victim.... takes place soon after the vernal equinox, and along with her are sacrificed sheep and goats; which, together with yams, heads of maize and plantains, are hung on stakes on each side of her. Females destined to be thus destroyed are brought up for the express purpose in the king's, or caboceer's seraglio, and it is said that their minds have been so powerfully wrought upon by the fetish men, that they proceed to the place of execution with as much cheerfulness as those infatuated Hindoo women who are burnt with their husbands. One was impaled while I was at Lagos, but of course I did not witness the ceremony. I passed by where her lifeless body still remained on the stake a few days afterwards."¹.

The last public human sacrifice in Abeokuta was offered in 1891 to the god Ọbalọfọn. Notice was given to the effect that this would take place, because "the babalawos had been warned by the oracle, that, if it were not offered, three disasters would happen, viz:- death among the great chiefs, drought through the failure of the usual rains, and a devastating scourge of locusts." - It was remarked that after the sacrifice had been offered, each of these calamities did occur. A slave was purchased who was to become the victim, and was kept shut up for a week or ten days before being killed. The writer, with the native catechist of the particular township and other native Christians, went daily to the chiefs and people to endeavour to dissuade them from their contemplated cruelty. The chiefs said "The people are determined to have it, and we cannot prevent it. We do not want it!" The people in the streets and market places said, "We do not want it. The chiefs are determined to have it, and we cannot prevent them!" The victim during the days of his incarceration was called by the honourable title Oluwo¹, and was allowed (according to the usual custom) to have every wish of his fully gratified, excepting only liberty and life. On the day immediately preceding his death, he was taken in procession round the township, made much of, and allowed to gratify his every desire. On the fatal day, he was brought out and publicly clubbed to death. The body was then tossed about, kicked, mocked and abused; but afterwards worshipped as an orisha. Some of the tribes believe that the victim of a human sacrifice will (by way of compensation) be reborn and become a king.

¹. A title given to a ruler of the country.

Bishop Johnson tells us of the human victim, that he is commonly led and paraded through the streets of the town or city of the sovereign who would sacrifice him for the well-being of his government and of every family and individual under it, in order that he may carry off the sin, guilt, misfortune and death of every one without exception. Ashes and chalk would be employed to hide his identity by the one being thrown freely over his head and his face painted with the latter, whilst individuals would often rush out of their houses to lay their hands upon him that they might thus transfer to him their sin, guilt, trouble and death. This done, he is taken through a temporary sacred shed of palm and other tree branches and especially of the former, the Igbodu, and to its first division, where many persons might follow him, and through a second where only the chiefs and other very important persons might escort and accompany him, and to a third where only the Babalawo, and his assistant, the Ajigbona are permitted to enter with him. Here, after he himself has given out or started his last song, which is to be taken up by the large assembly of people, who have been waiting to hear his last word, or his last groan, his head is taken off and his blood offered to the gods. The announcement of his last word, or his last groan, heard and taken up by the people, would be a signal for joy, gladness and thanksgiving, and for drum beating and dancing, as an expression of their gratification, because their sacrifice has been accepted, the divine wrath is appeased and the prospect of prosperity or increased prosperity assured."

The more usual method of execution in these cases was by beheading; but the writer was told that in the instance which he personally experienced (but did not go to witness) the victim was clubbed. In the case of human victims offered to Ògūn, before a war expedition, it was regarded as essential (in order that the sacrifice might be effectual) that the leaders should take the field before the sacrifice became offensive. When a human victim was offered to the devil, in olden days, his entrails were exposed before the temple, or shrine, and his body suspended from a tree, or scaffolding of poles.

Other instances of human sacrifice are in the case of twin-children, and also of those who cut their upper teeth first,¹ which, before the British occupation, was "carried on at New Calabar, as in Aboh and Old Calabar.

¹. Dr David Livingstone records a similar custom among the Bakaa and Bakwains of South Africa. - Missionary Travels and Researches. p. 577.

Even as late as 1856 an albino child was sacrificed, at the bar of the first-named river, to the shark, who was up to a late period the juju of this country".¹

CANNIBALISM. There is no record of cannibalism of a general type among the Yorubas, although a neighbouring tribe dwelling on the shores of the lagoon have practised it, and it was formerly very common on the lower Niger. "During the year 1859 human flesh was exposed for sale as butcher's meat in the market at Duke Town, Old Kalabar."² But there is a practice which obtains among these people, which is of the character of cannibalism and may be regarded as a branch of their religious belief and practice. Ellis tells us that the "Priests of Ògún usually take out the hearts of human victims (offered to their god in sacrifice.-S.S.F.) which are dried, reduced to powder, then mixed with rum, and sold to persons who wish to be endowed with great courage, and who drink the mixture. The reason of this is that the heart is believed to be the seat of courage and to inherently possess that that quality; and that when the heart is devoured and swallowed the quality with which it is imputed is also taken into the system." When the writer was in Abeokuta, on the death of a king his heart was taken out and had to be eaten by his successor. Also the head of the deceased monarch was preserved and had to be worshipped by the new ruler. The reason given by the Niger tribes for justification of their practice of eating their enemies was that it gave them additional courage. Human sacrifices were generally only offered by chiefs of the highest rank, and this at the instigation of the priests, and "in behalf of the town, government, or people".

Ordinary sacrifices may be offered for and by any private person, or a particular family, or a township, or the whole city, or country, in the name of its ruler, or rulers. A family sacrifice is Ebo Agbolé (S. of the household). A township " is Ebo Igboro (S. of the open street). A city " is Ebo Agbálu (S. of sweeping the town), or Ebo Oba (S. of the king).

We find then that the three main aspects of sacrifice are all represented in the Yoruba system:-

- (1) Food offered to the god - a "free-will offering".
- (2) Food shared with the god - a "sacramental meal", or "communion", (a) simply feasting on the victim, or (b) "eating the god",¹ as when the new king eats his deceased predecessor's heart to receive thereby his divinity.

(3). Propiation for sin committed; not so much to remove guilt (as such) but to placate an offended deity and avert his threatened vengeance.

PRIESTHOOD. The Yoruba priesthood has been regarded as comprising three distinct orders:-

The first order, and by far the most important and influential, is that of the Babalawos, or priests of Ifà; and these are of various grades; the Oluwó, who is senior and chief, and whose directions must be obeyed by all the others; the Ajigbona, who is chief assistant to the Oluwó, especially on great occasions in the offering of a great sacrifice; the Òdòfin, next in rank to the Oluwó, who acts for him in his absence; the Aró who is third in rank, and acts in place of his two seniors, when both are absent; the Asare Pawó, the messenger who calls assemblies and prepares the place of worship; the Asawó, deputy to the last named. An Apětèbi or Esu, or Ayayo, is a woman, who is regarded as the wife of Ọrúnmìlà himself, and who may be in reality either a Babalawo's wife, or the wife of anyone for whom a sacrifice is to be offered and who is always expected to give assistance at it. An Aworò is a chief minister devoted to a particular orisha and to him pertains the duty of putting to death the victim of a human sacrifice.

Par. Ellis gives as a second rank of the first order of priesthood, priests of the medical orishas, Òsánhín¹ and Aroni; and as the third rank of the same order those who serve Obàtálá and Oḍudua. All of the above wear white clothes, except the priests of ^{Ifà at} Ifè, who wear light blue. The marks of office of a Babalawo are a wristlet of palm fibre, or of variously coloured beads round the left wrist, and a cow's or bullock's tail, which he always carries with him; and a sacred staff of any one of four forms.

The Second Order (according to Ellis) includes in its first rank the priests of Shango, the Oni-Shango and the Magbas. The special badge is a necklace of black, red and white beads. One of red and white only may be worn by any Shango worshippers. The second rank of this order comprises the priests of all other Orishas, except Orishako. Those consecrated to Ògún wear an iron bracelet on the left arm, and to Qshun, brass armlets and anklets. Qshun's necklace is of transparent amber coloured beads.

The Third Order, again, has two ranks, the first being the priesthood (male and female) of Orishako, and the second the priests of demi-gods and deified men. These latter may have a small white mark on the forehead.

The priestesses of Orishako, as has been previously stated, wear a special vertical badge of red and white in the middle of the forehead. These priestesses are treated with the greatest respect, far more (very often) than that given to male priests. In Whydah, on the Dahomian coast, young girls are dedicated to the worship of the serpent and are called "brides of the serpent". They have figures of flowers and of animals burnt into their skin.

Par. The duties of the priesthood are three-fold, viz:-

To act as mediators in offering sacrifices;

To practise divination; whether by palm-nuts or drawing lots;

To conduct trials by ordeal.

TEMPLES & SHRINES. These vary in importance, from enclosed temples, with attached priests and priestesses, to a tiny space with a small image, over which is erected a frail roof of thatch, the sides being quite open. The temples were not open to any Christian missionary, or teacher; indeed the writer was told that any Christian man would enter ^{some} only at the peril of his life. In the streets of Abeokuta and Ibadan, great numbers of small idol-houses are met with. Ordinarily the temple is a circular mud hut thatched with grass, or palm leaves, the interior being painted in the colours sacred to the particular god. The doors, shutters, posts and eaves are rudely carved.

A FOREST PATH

Shrines are open to the street and any passers-by may show devotion to the deities represented.

GROVES are to be met with in Abeokuta, or any other large town, where there is plenty of thick bush; but most of the worst ones are away from the towns, right out in "the bush", properly so called. If one follows a small foot-path leading into "bush" (i.e. thick, wild "scrub") he will probably come to a warning to stop. The path, shut in on both sides by thick bushes, will lead to, and through, a narrow entrance, which, having no door or gate, has one or more palm-fronds stretched across it. This is called a Mariwo,¹ and is a sign that it is a sacred spot and no uninitiated person may pass the palm-branch, under pain of severe penalty - probably torture and death. There is, as a rule, no human guardian on duty; but the pagan Yoruba would fear the curse of the deity if he passed the palm-barrier. Should any ^{un-}authorized person dare to intrude, and be caught in the act, he would find himself in for serious trouble! These groves are frequently designated Igboro, (i.e., Igbo-Oro, "bush of Oro") indicating the form of spirit-worship practised there. Oro is sometimes played in the day-time, even when no confinement has been proclaimed, but it must be confined to these groves. In them have been practised terrible forms of torture and death on.

those who have been condemned and "handed over to Oro". Others, again, are dedicated to Elukú, Egun, Ògún, and other deities, for their secret worship.

IMAGES, or IDOLS, may be classified as public and private. Public idols are those in the temples and shrines, which are available for the worship of all who desire to render it. Private idols are those of the particular family or individual. In a certain part of the house, or compound, will be seen one or more fixed images to which devotion is daily paid by the inmates. These are frequently on the wall at the back of the verandah which faces the open courtyard of the compound.¹ Orishas generally are not taken into dwelling -houses; but Shango and Oya are exceptions to this rule. There are also the small portable images, generally of wood, which the worshipper can take with him when he leaves home. These correspond to the Semitic "teraphim". The images of the tutelary deities of particular individuals are destroyed on the death of these persons, since the "guardian angel" is supposed to have left them and they are no longer spirit-inhabited, but are merely "common wood."

DEATH AND BURIAL CUSTOMS. These may be noted here, as they are a form of worship, viz:- the beatification of ancestors. On the death of the head of a family, or any other person of importance, the watching relatives at once break out into most distressful wailing and lamentations. They rush out into the street, crying aloud Epa!!! Oro!! Baba wa lo l'oni o! Baba wa li a mowa! Awa kò rí o! Epa! Oro!— i.e. "Alas!!! Oro!! (i.e. "Torment!" or invocation of "Oro", the spirit of death). Our father has gone to-day! It is our father we are seeking! We cannot find him!-- "Alas! Oro!" "I go to the market, - He is not there! --- I go to the streets, - He is not there! --- I go to the house. - He is not there!--- Nevermore shall I see him," etc., etc.,

Par: The body is carefully washed by the mourning relatives, and all hair shaved off. It is then rubbed all over with camwood and water. (This wood is white, but turns red on exposure to the air). The body, having been clothed in the best garments, is then laid on a mat (the only bed known to a Yoruba). The feet are brought together and the great toes tied to each other, the hands being placed on the chest and the thumbs likewise tied. The mouth and nose are plugged with cotton-wool and each of the children of the departed one covers the body with a fine cloth.

Friends and neighbours are now invited to come and take part in mourning for the deceased, and in comforting the sorrowing relatives. The body is watched day and night, lamps being kept burning to dispel the darkness. The body is fanned by a young relative. If there is a grand-child, whose mother is the deceased's daughter, it is the office of this little one to wield the fan. As the watching and mourning goes on night and day, the funeral feast is continually kept up. Ample food is provided for the guests, and continual supplies of drink, native beer, palm wine, and trade gin and rum, are freely indulged in; but not by the chief mourners, who remain shut up in a neighbouring apartment. The beating of drums is kept up almost continuously, and this feasting and drumming are maintained, in the case of any person of importance, for a full week. If the deceased has a married daughter, her husband is responsible for the digging of the grave, which has from time immemorial always been in the house of the departed. The floor of the native houses is of beaten mud, which is kept in condition by being rubbed over every week with horse-dung and water. The grave having been dug, with the assistance of a number of helpers, a sheep or goat is purchased (at the expense of the deceased's children) and, the body having been laid in the grave, the animal to be sacrificed is killed over it, so that its blood falls upon the corpse. Then the sons and daughters weep over the open grave, so that their tears likewise fall upon it. They also express good wishes to the deceased - "May you arrive in peace!" - "May you not stray from the right path!" etc. The grave, which is usually very shallow, is then filled in.

The expense of these funerals is very great and often leads to the impoverishment of the whole family, so much so, that the mourners will sell themselves into slavery, or pawn their children as slaves, in order to provide a great funeral. This is not entirely due to a feeling of pride; but to show reverence to the deceased, for it is believed that the soul of the dead cannot attain to the realms of departed spirits, unless, and until, the body is duly and respectably buried; otherwise it wanders about, or hovers near the body, in terrible restlessness.

The burial of persons of importance has been from of old the prerogative of the Ogboni society. This is the senatorial court of the town, or district, and its power is so great that even the king and head chiefs dare not go against it. It is one of the leading secret societies, or guilds, of the country, and any free man may be initiated as a kind of honorary member, but this does not entitle him to sit in the senate. To this society, and to any others of which a man may be a member, every heavy fees have to be paid on his burial, ostensibly that they may make adequate etùtù, or propitiary sacrifices.

"Adeṣola", the pseudonymous writer on burial customs in The Nigerian Chronicle, says :- "There is no native but belongs to one or another of these guilds. Some belong to several, and a man's rank is estimated according to the guild, or guilds, to which he belongs. Whatever amount remains after the necessary expenses are made is distributed among the members, and every individual is given a portion, however small, in proportion to his status. The enjoyment of this benefit is regarded as one accumulated debt for every individual, and imposes an obligation upon their children to make similar contributions to the guild towards their parents' funerals at their deaths".... The "song repeated at funerals is to keep them always in recollection of this fact. This expense is always heaviest in connection with the Ogboni society. This is both a political, social, and secret society. In fact it is the king's chief consultative chamber in all matters, and its principle members form the Cabinet. They lay the corpse with full masonic rites. In their passage to and from the house of mourning, they sound alarms with their state drums of various height and sounds, so that every woman, or uninitiated man, might flee from their presence , either in the street or in the house of mourning..... The members are sometimes called Oshogbo, which is the Ijebu name for this society. A few elderly women are always admitted and these are generally distinguished from others by having certain cotton strings (okùn) tied round their wrists; such women are supposed to be for ever precluded from marriage."

Par. To comfort the mourners, and especially to confirm the women in the belief that the soul lives after death and goes to the abode of spirits, the aid of the Egun and Oro societies is called in. While the mourning relatives are all assembled, a person who acts as Egun lies hidden in an adjoining room. Presently one of the mourners strikes on the ground thrice and cries out Baba, baba, baba! Da mi l'ohùn! i.e. "Father, father, father! Answer me!" ----- From the adjoining room comes an answer in "Egun-voice" (ventriloquial), and all are comforted and filled with joy, on the supposition that the spirit of the deceased, although unseen, is indeed present with them. Food having been placed by the women in the Egun's room (he having concealed himself, or departed), after he has answered, each guest in turn goes in and helps himself, thus performing an act of communion with the deceased. The Egun does not wear his dress while concealed in the room; but, should he desire to come out and join in the festivities, he dons it, and will then speak as, and state himself to be, the spirit of the one who is being mourned. Eguns going thus into the street claim to have come from heaven, and to be therefore entitled to respect and to free-will offerings from the people. Some days after the burial, an Egun comes at night and calls out the name of the deceased; and, after further days have passed, he comes in the day-time, accompanied by followers and proceeds to the house of the deceased, where he reports that he has safely reached the spirit-world and is well and happy. In return for this good news he is provided with food, rum, and palm-wine, of which he partakes in private, since spirits must not be seen to eat! When he and his followers have finished loud groans indicate that he is departing.

After the burial Oro comes, at night, of course, for no woman must see him. A ram may be killed and cooked and its head placed on the wall near to the grave of the worshipper's father. The figure of a man is drawn with white chalk on the wall near to the grave, and the head is hung on this figure. We may again quote from "Adesola's" article in the Nigerian Chronicle;-

"The whole company of gods and men proceed outside to what is called the Oro-pagi ('Oro kills the tree') or Oro-jegi ('Oro eats the tree') ceremony. For its performance the newly deified takes the company to the highest tree in the neighbourhood, in order to show proof of its divinity by 'eating up' every leaf thereon, to its latest shoot. At a convenient distance from this tree gods and men accommodate themselves as best is possible—the gods crying with all their might and the men drumming very loudly, singing and dancing at the same time. As it is not permitted to the uninitiated to know how this spirit feat is performed, suffice it to say that one wakes up in the morning to see that particular tree denuded of its leaves: and it will require the service of the most powerful microscope to discover even the tiniest and latest shoot anywhere about the tree up to the loftiest branch, or on the surrounding surface, or anywhere about the vicinity of the tree. These leaves are supposed to have been literally eaten up by the god.. Suspended on this tree between any two of its branches which are topmost, or sometimes left streaming on one of the branches which is the highest, is a new mat or a white or a red piece of cloth.... What these mats or cloths are intended to symbolize ought to be evident....

Unlike the Egungun and the Agemo, the incarnated form of the Oro is never habited in cloths or mats. What its nature and habiliments are is supposed to be a mystery, and jealously guarded up, to the present, from the gaze of women. In fact, Oro is worshipped more in its inane and spiritual form than in a materialised shape. It is to the former that sacrifices are offered, not to the latter. Among the Egbas, who are the originators of this cult, the Oro Awe ceremony is the only funeral rite performed in connection with this worship, when the spirit is supposed to pass from the "unburied" into the "buried" state. Viewing it in this connection the mat, or cloths, suspended on the tree must be taken to represent the mats or cloths with which the dead was buried; and its suspension to signify that the spirit of the deceased, now purified with funeral rites, and having entered into that state of spirit life in which it can be invoked and worshipped, cast behind it in its flight to the spirit world, these earthly encumbrances as being useless to it.....

After the completion of this Oro pagi ceremony they (gods and men) again repair to the house; and, having regaled themselves with the ~~remnants~~, they re-form into a procession, remove the mariwo from the gate, march direct for the Abore's and thence to their own house. ere break of day. In the morning the inmates return to the house of mourning, set a mark to the dedicated spot, and congratulate one another that the departed has passed into the Oro stage and can be invoked at any time for worship".

par: The death of the well-to-do head (Balé) of a compound adjoining the mission house at Aké in Abeokuta was celebrated with all the fore-going ceremonies, and shortly afterwards the writer noticed on the country road a new shrine consisting of a small thatched shed, which protected a mud image, intended to represent the deceased, and marked with his tribal mark (i.e., three vertical cuts on each cheek). About the image were placed some of his possessions and offerings of food. This shrine, however, was soon neglected and the image fell into decay.¹.

Should a member of the Oro society die, his funeral must be attended by everyone of his fellow-members. The chief mourner gives to Oro a sacrifice of a ram, native beer, and kola nuts. The kola is then made to touch the head of the corpse and the mourners with their closed fists, one on the top of the other, touch the head likewise, and then the head of the son who is to succeed the deceased. The head of the corpse is again touched three times with the kola, and then the head of the son, and prayer is offered to the dead that he will bless the living. The ram is then killed and the children rub its blood on their heads. This sacrifice must be repeated by the children every year, and the ram's head (as stated above) fixed to the wall.

It may here be noted that the great and solemn importance attached to the Yoruba burial customs was a sore test to the early converts to Christianity. They were taunted by the heathen with the words "You will be buried out in the bush!"

SECRET SOCIETIES. Throughout the whole of pagan West Africa there are many secret societies, which are all of a religious, or semi-religious character. Some of these have already been prominently before us, viz:- the Oro society, the Egun society and the Ogboni society. These have been compared by some writers with European Freemasonry and its various grades and lodges. Some of them would seem to be of totemic origin, e.g. the "Leopard", "Crocodile" and "Python" societies of the Sierra Leone hinterland. The members of these cults have made it their business to destroy human life in terribly cruel ways. During the Sierra Leone rebellion of 1895-96, many bodies of human victims were found in the bush, bearing marks as if slain by one of the creatures from which these societies take their names. Members of the "Leopard" society wore leopard skins, which had the pads fitted with sharp steel claws with which they mauled and slew their victims. The "Crocodile" society members, likewise, clothed themselves with crocodile skins, and with sharp teathed instruments slew their victims, and the "Pythons" crushed theirs to death. These victims were supposed to be slain by the god of the particular cult to satisfy his vengeance. The leading secret society of the Sierra Leone and Timné country is known as the Poro society, and its leading ministers or magicians as Tassos and Morri-men.

TOTEMISM. There is no organised and general totemism to be found among the Yorubas, worthy of any degree of comparison with that of the aborigines of Australia, or of the Red Indians of British Columbia; but traces of it are to be found not only in the secret societies already referred to, but in the spirit of taboo which prevails so strongly in Yoruba-land under the name of Ẹwò. A careful study of this system of prohibition shows how carefully it guards against any possibility of undesirable marriages. It provides the equivalent of a table of kindred and affinity showing the degrees of consanguinity within ^{which} marriage is forbidden. It can also be made exclusive, by pronouncing all who are of a certain family, or tribe, to be ẽwò to the parties concerned. Colonel Ellis, in his book on the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast, tells us that a belief in totemism is common among those tribes. They are divided into totemic clans (or families) such as the "Leopard", "Dog", "Buffalo", "Parrot", "Plantain", "Corn- stalk", "Palm-oil grove", "Abadzi" and "Dumnica" clans.¹

A member of the Leopard clan may not kill a leopard; but should he do so accidentally he must bemoan him, "Alas! my brother! " and pour palm oil on the wounds he has inflicted. The totem-animal is addressed as "Grand-father", which is also given as a title of respect to the king of Ashanti, even as the title "Leopard" is in Yoruba-land given to the Alâfin of Qyq. — When a member of the Leopard clan dies, its members make spots on their bodies to represent the leopard's skin, and scratch the figure of a leopard on the wall of the house and on the coffin. Dr. Nassau tells us that totem worship is found to some extent in the Gaboon and Qgowé districts; but that is almost nothing in comparison with that of the Indian tribes of the North American continent.

CHAPTER IX.

THE WORLD OF THE MYSTERIOUS.

Intimately associated with the religion of primitive peoples are found certain forms of belief and practice in the region of the "uncanny", variously designated as "superstition", "fetish", "magic", "mana", "witchcraft", "occultism"^{etc.}, and illustrated by the use of charms and amulets.

The African child of nature, like his brethren of other primitive races, has a profound respect for, and a very real belief in, the mysterious. He believes intensely in the spirit-world, and in the possibility of exercising, through spirit-agency, a power that can be exhibited by no physical means. He has also a firm belief in an indefinable sort of power, that he calls by a special term, for which in English (lacking an equivalent word) we use the term "medicine". This is very similar to the conception of mana¹, which prevails among the tribes of Melanesia and Australia, and which has claimed so much attention from anthropologists since Bishop Codrington first called attention to it. This term is used to denote a mysterious power, or influence, which is supernatural, and beyond the power of the senses to detect, or of the mind to explain. It may, or may not, be connected with some spirit, or deity. Originally, and perhaps more usually, the conception is not directly connected with any such being. It is not the same as "magic", for it is sometimes attributed to inanimate objects, such as a stone of unusual form. Should one be found resembling a yam, it may be buried where yams are cultivated, and if a good harvest results this is attributed to the mana possessed by the said stone. Any power, or skill, beyond the average, possessed by a person, securing success in war, hunting, etc., may be attributed to mana. It is, in short, a general term for power, or influence, of an "uncanny" type, whether for good or evil. A similar conception is found among the Iroquois Indians of Huron, expressed by the term orenda.

Among the Yoruba people the same idea of supernatural and supersensuous power is expressed by the term ogùn.

The significance of this term is generally expressed in English by the word "medicine", not medicine of a material kind, e.g., drugs, for which the term egbogì is generally used, but of that kind which is practised by a "medicine-man", or witch-doctor. It is, however, not a specific term limited to witch-craft, for which the word is àjé, but a general one, which may be used for this, or other forms of mysterious power, either good or bad, and possessed not only by wizards, but by other human beings, or animals, or even inanimate objects. The following are some examples of the use of the term, which will show the similarity to the Melanesian mana.

The dread of mysterious power, unseen and intangible, is expressed in a proverb about the lion,-

Kiniun di elewòn, ki erankoki ki o ma iso jè, kiniun kò jẹ eran ìkasi: bi yio ba dùn, a ní, Bikoşe erin, bikoşe enia, bikoşe ohun dudu, on kò beru enikan.

that is,

"The lion is the snare of the forest; let every beast take heed how he feeds, for the lion does not eat

161a

stale meat. When he roars, he says, "Except the elephant, except man, except the black thing, I fear nobody.' "

The order of dread is on the ascending scale, "the black thing" signifies the "uncanny", the vague mysterious power greater than man.

At the sacred town of Ifè, are some ancient pillars of stone, conical, round and rectangular. Nothing is known of their history; but they are said to be the bodies of gods, or men, who were turned to stone, and (being mysterious, and supposed to possess power) are called ogùn.¹

On the opposite page is shown a photograph, taken by the writer in one of the townships of Abeokuta, esteemed so very sacred that a mere look at the shrine and the setting up of the camera caused opposition which seemed likely to develop into serious trouble, until an explanation and request to a passing chief secured official permission to take the picture. The palings enclose a pedestal, on which rests a slab of stone. The frayed palm-fronds and grass suspended in front are the mariwo (which means "Don't pry into secrets!"). Enquiry as to what shrine it was elicited no further response than Ogùn ni, i.e. "It is ogùn." It is hardly likely that the god Ògún could have been indicated, for a shrine of a totally different character, dedicated to him, was close by. The Yoruba native is, however, very fond of punning, especially with words of precisely the same form and sound, but differing in tonal accentuation.

Things used in spirit-worship, e.g., the wooden masks worn in Oro-worship, the "Oro-stick" (i.e., the "bull-roarer"), the magician's staff, etc., may all be said, in a loose sense, to possess ogùn; but, so far as is known to the uninitiated, Oro-sticks are not treated with any such ceremony as the churinga of the Australian blacks.

A curse is greatly dreaded, because it possesses this same mysterious power. So far does this go, that to foretell possible evil, even in a friendly warning, arouses great fear. Such an injunction as "Take care, or your child will be sick", will call forth the expostulation, "Ah! you are cursing him". The idea is (apparently) that ogùn, possessed by the speaker, (presumably his psychic force) goes forth with the words to effect what is prognosticated.

But the strongest and most terrible exercise of this mysterious power is experienced in the dreaded practice of apètá, i.e., "invocation-shooting", - (a form of "sympathetic magic". A person, desiring to kill anyone against whom he has a grudge, makes a mud image of his intended victim, and at night sets this up, calls the name of his foe three times, and then shoots at the figure with a miniature bow and arrows. At that instant the victim feels a sharp pain in the region of his body which in the figure representing him has been struck by the arrow. A wound, or abscess, quickly develops, from which he soon dies, unless he recognises the nature of the injury and can apply a counter-charm, a more powerful "medicine" (ogùn) than that which has injured him. A native clergyman, well educated and thoughtful, showed the writer a terrible scar on his leg, which he steadily affirmed was produced, in his youth, by apètà. On the other hand, the writer once attended a woman suffering from cancer of the breast, which the sufferer attributed to apètà. But such an error in diagnosis does not alter the fact of the existence of the "idea" in the Yoruba belief, nor prove that there are no genuine cases. In their work The Northern Tribes of Central Australia, Messrs Spencer and Gillen describe the practice of Arungquiltha, the use of the magic spear, which closely corresponds to the Yoruba apètà. M. Declé also tells us that "among the Matabele of South Africa, it is well understood that there are two kinds of witchcraft.....To bewitch anyone, according to Matabele belief, it is enough to spread medicine on his path, or in his hut.....If you want to cause an enemy to die, you make a clay figure...pierce it with a needle. The first time he comes in contact with an enemy he will be speared."¹

The Rev. J. Buckley Wood, who had at the time spent forty years among the Yorubas, told the writer that when he was visiting a certain chief, the latter said of a man at a great distance, who had offended him, "He shall die to-morrow." It was impossible for him to send a messenger, or any poison, to reach his foe in less than three days, and yet in about a week came the news that the man had died on the day predicted. The form of "black magic" used in this case was not made known.

The evidence for these cases is so strong that it is difficult to disbelieve them. The writer, sceptical at first, was compelled by the testimony of unimpeachable witnesses to modify his own views. In common with other missionaries, he experienced at times a deep consciousness of the presence of some unseen personality resisting strongly all Christian effort. Such experiences, together with the testimony of the best native converts, account for the fact that many Christian missionaries believe that these terrible forms of "sympathetic magic" are performed through the agency of evil spirits; but it is, of course, theoretically possible that a psychological force, of far greater power than we at present understand, is the effective cause. There is certainly intense projective force of will exercised.¹

The power of "medicine" (ogùn) exercised through a certain channel may be neutralized or overcome, by a superior power of ogùn through another channel. Van Genet tells us that in Madagascar fedy, (the local term for "taboo") may be broken by one who has a higher power known as hassina. So in Yoruba, a stronger "medicine" is employed to overcome, or counteract, an evil one, or a curse incurred through a broken êwò (taboo). This is the explanation of the use of "charms", whether material (as amulets) vocal, or actionary. It is the invocation of a higher power, or a fuller measure of the same power.

The term ogùn may be used in a good sense, although more often it carries a bad one. The Yoruba term for physician is oniseḡùn, i.e., "he who works ogùn". The cognate word ologùn, i.e., "he who has ogùn", is only used of one who practices "bad medicine", witchcraft, etc. The accusation of witchcraft is much dreaded, and may lead to trial by ordeal, as told in a previous chapter.

Dr Marett says, "Not every man has mana, nor every ghost; but the soul of a man of power becomes, as such, a ghost of power, though in his capacity of ghost he has it in greater force than when he was alive."¹ Substituting the word ogùn for "mana", this exactly applies to the Yoruba belief.

¹. Threshold of Religion, p. 134.

The words "fetish" and "fetishism", so constantly applied to West African religion, are often used in a loose and incorrect sense. The word "fetish" is from the Portuguese feitico, which was applied by the voyagers from Portugal, who in the fifteenth century discovered the West African coast, to the charms and amulets which they saw the Africans wearing, and which they compared with their own images and relics of saints etc. The term "fetish" is properly applied to any material object which has been duly prepared or consecrated by the witch-doctor, with appropriate rites and ceremonies, by virtue of which it becomes invested with power to perform the purpose for which it has been prepared, subject to the will of its possessor.¹ "Fetishism" is the term properly applied to the use of fetishes. A fetish is not worshipped, so that fetishism is not worship, and the religion of the African should not be so called, as it is only one of its features and not the thing itself. The owner "does not worship his fetish, but regards it as a little bit of property which cannot but be of service to him through its supernatural powers."²

168a

ENTRANCE TO CHIEF'S HOUSE - OGBOMOSHỌ

The purposes for which "fetishes", or charms are used are past numbering. The Rev. J.L.Wilson, who has already been quoted, writes;-

"There are several classes of fetish, for each of which there is a separate name. One of these classes embraces such as are worn about the person and are intended to shield the wearer from witchcraft and all the ordinary ills of human life. They are expected to bring him good luck, and inspire him with courage and wisdom. Another class are such as are kept in their dwellings, having a particular place assigned to them, and correspond in the offices they perform to the penates of the Romans. They have also nation-fetishes to protect their towns from fire, pestilence and from surprise by their enemies. They have others to procure rain, to make fruitful seasons, and to cause abundance of game in their woods and fish in their waters."¹.

Charms and amulets of various kinds are greatly used by the Yorubas. The photograph on the opposite page depicts the entrance to the house of the Bâlè, or head-chief,

Western Africa, p.214.

AMULETS WORN ROUND THE NECK

of Ọgbomọṣọ, who being of a particularly nervous and superstitious nature had not only a number of tutelary gods guarding the threshold of his dwelling, but had laid in the ground, from one side of his compound to the other, chains and other charms to render each person who approached him powerless to do any evil. Charms for the protection of property are fastened to the houses etc. They may consist of sticks, stumps of trees etc.

The general term for amulets, or body charms, is ōndè (i.e. "a prisoner"). These are usually sewn up in leather to be worn on the person. Some of these are made and sold by Mohammedan mullahs, and contain a few words from the Korān, or from an Islamic charm-book. Those made and sold by heathen priests may contain such substances as stones, chips, rags, sticks, spices, blood, clippings of hair, nails etc. A human eyeball, or a bit of a human skull is specially prized. Sometimes snail-shells or antelope horns are used. The charm often has some connection with the purpose for which it is prepared, e.g. to give strength and courage, a portion of an elephant or a leopard; to give speed or cunning, a bit of a gazelle; or to give wisdom, a portion of human brain. Some amulets, as the iron armlet (ajude) worn by the worshippers of Ògún, have no virtue or "medicine" of their own, but are to remind the god that the wearer is under his protection.

Although the African does not worship his fetish, he has profound faith in it. The wearer of a protective charm against gunshot wounds challenged the writer to fire at him while he was wearing the said charm, indeed urged him to do so. Needless to say, the test was declined! On another occasion, a maid-servant in the mission compound was stung by a scorpion, and the writer's cook took up the "venomous beast" and played with it, allowing it to run about in his hands! He said that the charm against scorpion stings was to eat the sting of one, and as he had formerly done this he could not be stung. After the girl had been relieved by a hypodermic injection of potassium permanganate, she was persuaded by the cook to eat the sting which had caused her distress.

Witchcraft is a terrible reality to the pagan African, and as already stated the accusation of practising it is greatly dreaded. The witch-doctor, is, of course, a privileged person. He is called in to trace the source of disease and death, for these are generally attributed to witchcraft, unless they are evidently caused by the vengeance of Şoponq (small-pox), Shango, or some similar deity. Various forms of disease are described as "snakes inside" (ejo-inu), "an insect" (ko-koro) etc., and it is supposed that these have been introduced by a foe, through the agency of witchcraft. Strictly, a person accused of witchcraft should be tried by ordeal, and then, if proved guilty, immediately put to death; but so great is the indignation of the populace against the practice, that the accused is likely to be lynched without any trial. This mode of procedure has, of course, been modified where the British government is in power.

Undoubtedly, witchcraft has always been largely practised, and under this term we should probably be justified in placing the deeds of many members of various secret societies, done in the darkness of the night. In Abeokuta, in an open thoroughfare, there was a well-thatched circular shed, the space covered being occupied in the centre by a conical mound of earth, the apex of which was covered by an earthenware lid. There was no sign of an image or any form of orisha. On lifting the lid, the writer was almost choked by the abominable effluvia which arose, for a large earthenware pot, built into the mound, was seen to be nearly full of a dark liquid, in which writhed and squirmed many huge grubs, like giant maggots. On making enquiry as to what this could be, he was told that this is called Ère, that it is only used for evil purposes, and that night-parties of bad persons would sit around to drink spirits and plan or perpetrate evil deeds. Wizards are believed to hold nocturnal meetings at the foot of the àpa tree (i.e., the African mahogany). Here too the owl often appears, but instead of being the messenger of the tree-spirit, the bird is the wizard himself. The àpa tree is the emblem of vengeance. It is so sacred that before it is cut down its spirit must be propitiated by the offering of a rowl and palm-oil.

Another form of witchcraft is known as Şigidi, or Şugudu. This has sometimes been mistaken for an orisha, but it is not one. It is an utterly bad form of demonology, or witchcraft, perpetrated "through the agency of an evil spirit". It is akin to Eşù (Satan) and is employed by the babalawos. In connection with Ifà, it is regarded as more powerful than Eşù. It is always represented by a figure made of mud. Ellis (except that he seems to regard it as an orisha) gives a good account of it. He says it is "nightmare deified". Its name appears to mean something short or bulky, and the demon is represented by a broad and short head, made of clay, or more commonly by a thick blunted cone of clay, which is ornamented with cowries, and is no doubt emblematic of the head. Shigidi is an evil deity, or spirit, who enables a man to gratify revenge in secret, and without risk to himself. When anyone desires to revenge himself on another, he offers a sacrifice to Shigidi, who thereupon proceeds to the house of the person indicated and kills him. The person who employs Shigidi must remain awake until that demon returns, or his mission will fail.

One other form of witchcraft, that is believed in, is in connection with such secret societies as those of the Sierra Leone and Sherbro countries, already described as the Leopard, Crocodile and Serpent societies. These societies, as such, are not mentioned as existing among the Yorubas, but there are certain persons, members of the Egun society (but not all of its members), who claim to be able to turn into leopards, crocodiles, or pythons, to kill their victim, and then to turn into human beings again! This is done by Eguns only, and in co-operation with, and by the power of, the babalawos. The Yoruba term for this procedure is Fan-gbé, or Idan.¹

It may be noted that many babalawos will undertake to kill enemies for their clients, by the exercise of sympathetic magic, or demonology. This murder by proxy is to save the actual murderer from all danger, and the babalawo, if called in to treat the sufferer, can saddle the crime on anyone against whom he has a grudge, and, of course, shield himself. Poisoning, by the use of natural poisons, is largely practised by the babalawos and others, who are terribly expert in this evil art. Many murders are thus committed with comparative impunity. But there remain many deaths which cannot be explained by the use of any material means, and must be attributed to 'black magic'.

Crystal-gazing, as such, is not found; but the use of lustral water is practised by babalawos thus:- A young child is taken by the priest, and after the offering of a sacrifice, the child's face is washed with lustral water, which is prepared with shea-butter and edible snails. The child, in a trance, sees and hears what is going on in the spirit-world, and reports to the priest. The child's work being finished, the priest, by the use of appropriate charms, restores it to normal consciousness, when the medium no longer remembers anything of what he has reported, the priest alone retaining the knowledge.

The last form of occultism we will deal with is necromancy. The late Bishop James Johnson wrote, in his work on Yoruba heathenism, as follows:-

"There are amongst the heathens those in our country who profess to exercise the office of speaking with the dead, and of being mediums of communications from them to the living, and who are known as Awon Abokusorò, - 'speakers with the dead' - and whose deliverances have generally been found to be true. But the system does not seem to be so elaborate with them as with their fellow-professors in Europe and America.....These divinations have often been successful.....This success must be attributed to either a synchronizing of divinely ordered events with those divinations, or to God's permitted employment of them through the agency of the devil, with his superior knowledge and capacity to deceive those who would be deceived.....in spite of warnings."^{1.}

^{1.} Isin Bibo Orisa, p.36sq.

In the year 1856, the Rev. J.L. Wilson, whose work has already been referred to, wrote,

"Native priests pretend to hold intercourse with them (i.e., the spirits) and become media between the dead and the living. The means by which this intercourse is held is always veiled in mystery; but quite as satisfactory proofs are given of the reality of the intercourse as are furnished by our modern spiritualists.....Undoubtedly it is a much older practice in Africa than in America... It commands almost universal assent there."

One of the burial customs of the Yorubas is known as iyakú, or "Parting with the dead", and in this connection there is a form of necromancy practised, if the deceased has died intestate, to find out what is his will concerning his property and the disposal of his dependent relatives. A council of elders is appointed, and two days are decreed, with a week's interval between them, for the necessary ceremonies. On the first day sacrifices are offered and a white fowl is tied to a pole. A figure in white dashes from the room of the deceased, seizes the fowl and flees into the bush, while the friends cry out Filé, filé! i.e., "Leave it, leave it!" They follow, but none overtake the "spirit". Only the feathers of the fowl remain to mark the course taken. A week later, further sacrifices are offered, kola-nuts are split in divination and their fragments thrown into a little hole dug for the purpose, together with some oil, water and sacred leaves. Three men, each holding in his hand the atori whip, demand the attendance of the spirit of the deceased. Their leader calls out his name and asks him to come out when he strikes on the ground, e.g.,

Buko, ô-ô-ô-ô-ô-ô! Mo pé o, ô-ô-ô-ô-ô! Bi mo ba fi isan yi lu ile, k'o jade wa, ô-ô-ô-ô-ô-ô!

"Buko, Oh! I am calling thee, Oh! If I strike the ground with this whip, come out! Oh!"

There is no response at the first or second call. A third call is given, with an abusive reproach, "If you do not reply, I shall go away with the belief that your soul has gone away into the body of an Ogbugbu (wild-duck) etc". Then a shrill voice is heard in a neighbouring grove, which, after repeated strikings on the ground, declares his will as requested. In this case it seems so evident that there is collusion, that it cannot be regarded as genuine necromancy. But the account here given is taken from a ceremony actually witnessed by the pseudonymous writer "Adéşplá."¹

CHAPTER X.

THE SOUL OF MAN AND ITS DESTINY.

We have remarked in an earlier chapter that, "while the study of African psychology is very fascinating, it is equally difficult and perplexing", and that it is "extremely complex and equally variable".

The West African tribes generally, e.g., the Ashantis of the Gold Coast, the Dahomians, and the various tribes to the south of the Niger, besides the Yorubas, believe that each human being is indwelt by certain spirits. These spirits are not to be regarded as the man himself, or even ^{as} part of him. His own soul is quite distinct from them. Among the Yorubas these are regarded as three in number:- (1) Olori, "the lord of the head", dwells in the brain and is worshipped. Olori is credited with bringing good fortune, and a proverb says "Olori causes the owner of the head to prosper and not the crab on the river-bank". Thus Olori appears to be the deification of intelligence and prudence. His symbol is half a calabash, studded over with cowries.

(2) Ipin-ijeun, "the sharer of the food", dwells in the stomach. As he thus shares in all the food of his host, no sacrifices are offered to him; but a proverb says "There is no orisha like the stomach. It receives food every day". In some measure, hunger seems to be personified as the servant of Ipin-ijeun, for the Yoruba equivalent of "I am hungry" is Ebi npa mi, i.e., "Hunger is killing me". As fire is necessary for the preparation of food, Ipin-ijeun is said to take fire under his special protection; hence the proverb, "Ipin-ijeun does not allow fire to depart from the earth". Fire itself is personified in the expression Ina njo, i.e., "Fire is dancing", where we should say "is burning". (3) Ipori, the third of these indwelling guardian spirits, is the least in importance, and rarely receives any sacrifice, except that, before a journey is undertaken, the toe will be anointed with fowl's blood and palm-oil; but water-fowl are ẽwò ("taboo") for Ipori, and must not be offered to him.

The primitive belief in the human soul, which preserves the personality and individuality of a man after death, arose, according to H. Spencer, from dreams.¹

Primitive man, dreaming of the dead, imagined that they continued after death and were met by his spirit when it was away out of his body. As his body continued to live and breathe while he dreamed, he concluded that he must possess two souls. Hence arose the belief in the "external soul".¹ The existence of this belief in the external soul, among the negroes of West Africa, is illustrated by the following story:-

"A queer West African story from Southern Nigeria relates how a king kept his soul in a little brown bird, which perched on a tall tree beside the gate of the palace. The king's life was so bound up with that of the bird that whosoever should kill the bird would simultaneously kill the king and succeed to the kingdom. The secret was betrayed by the queen to her lover, who shot the bird and thereby slew the king and ascended to the vacant throne".²

². Quoted by Sir J.G. Frazer, in The Golden Bough³, Vol. xi, from The Lower Niger and Its Tribes, by Major A.G. Leonard, pp. 319-321.

Dr Nassau tells how the Fans variously say,-

- (1) "I am one and my soul is myself. When I die it goes out somewhere else."
- (2) "I have two things. One is the thing which becomes a spirit when I die. The other is the spirit of the body and dies with it."
- (3) Others admit a third entity, a dream-soul, which wanders from the body and returns.
- (4) Others add a fourth entity, either a component part of the man or a guardian spirit.¹

By the Yorubas, the man's own personal soul, or spirit, is called iwìn, or okàn, this latter word being literally "heart". It is used of the physical organ, and also of the spiritual part of man. Another name is òjiji, or òji, i.e., "shadow", "shade", or "ghost". After death this human soul goes to Ipo-òkú, "the place (lit. "hole") of the dead, which is supposed to be beneath the earth, -- hence in myths the men who became orishas "descended into the earth" without dying. -- The after-death condition is the continuance of a similar life to that lived on earth, and the individual does the same work and actions, and has the same characteristics, as when on earth. The importance of proper burial rites has been mentioned in an earlier chapter, for unless, and until, these are duly performed, the soul cannot pass to the realms of the dead; but must wander about the earth in cold and hunger, and with no home. In this condition it may be seized by an evil spirit and borne off to Orun-apadi.

The Yorubas believe in two "heavens". The good one is Orun-afefe, ("the heaven of cool breezes"), or Orun-rere, ("the good heaven"). This is the proper realm of disembodied human spirits. The other "heaven" is Orun-apadi, ("the heaven of pot-sherds"), or Orun-buburu, ("the bad heaven"). This is a hot, dry, barren place like a pottery-kiln, heated with charcoal and heaped up with broken earthenware, and, of course, no water! To prevent the departed soul being whisked off to this dreadful place during the interval between death and burial, a fowl is immediately offered to propitiate the evil spirits. This is called "the fowl that buys the road", i.e., secures the right of way for the deceased.

The doctrine of metempsychosis holds a large place in Yoruba belief. It generally takes the form of reincarnation in a human body, and in the same family, for any number of times. The same guardian spirit as in an earlier existence may not, however, re-enter the child, Should it do so, it would probably be an Abikú and kill him. Thus heredity is explained, not by the return of the same guardian spirit, but by metempsychosis. Since re-birth seems to be the general experience, it would indicate that there can be few souls in the two heavens; but yet we are told that heaven contains a great number of people. Should a mother die in childbirth, the newborn child is thrown into the bush to perish. "It is a wicked person, whose first act on re-entering the world is to murder its own mother." A few days after the birth of a child, the babalawo is called in to tell the parents whose spirit, from among their former relatives, has animated the child. This the priest never fails to do, and tells at the same time the god which the newborn child is to worship. Many Yoruba names end in -túnḡe, which means "-- comes again". The same belief and custom is found among the aborigines of Central Australia. Messrs Spencer and Gillen tell us that "the secret, or Churinga name" is "in some cases.....that of the Alcheringa ancestor of whom he, or she, is supposed to be the re-incarnation."¹

Sometimes the human soul may be re-born as an animal, e.g., a leopard, or even, occasionally, as a plant. Hyenas (perhaps because of their "laugh") are credited with being, more often than other animals, indwelt by a human soul. The yellow monkey, Oloyo, is said to be frequently likewise indwelt. The Yorubas believe that the lower animals possess passions, moral qualities and souls, even as men, and that their souls exist after death and pass over to the realms of the dead. The Tchwis of the Gold Coast believe that all things not made by human hands are inhabited by kras, i.e., spirits.

The Yorubas believe that transmigration of the soul into the body of a lower animal is infrequent, and that its re-entrance into the world in plant form is still more rare. Col. Ellis relates at some length the legend of a boy, who, with his brother, went to a festival at a neighbouring village, where they so successfully entertained the people that they were each given one thousand cowries. On the way homeward, the elder brother murdered the younger and took his cowries. In response to enquiries, he said that he had left his brother behind on the road. As search failed to yield any trace of the lad, it was supposed that he had been kidnapped and sold. From his decaying bones sprang up a very large olú, or edible fungus, which was discovered by his mother, and, as she was about to pluck it, the fungus sang,-

"Do not pluck me, Mother,

Do not pluck me, Mother,

Do not pluck me, Mother,

I am a lowly plant on the ground.

I went to the village frolic,

I went to the village frolic,

I am a lowly plant on the ground:

I was given a thousand cowries,

I am a lowly plant on the ground.

Do not pluck me, Mother, etc. (as v. l.)

My brother received a thousand cowries,

My brother received a thousand cowries,

I am a lowly plant on the ground:

But he slew me for my cowries,

I am a lowly plant on the ground."

The woman, amazed and shocked, called her husband, who in turn called the king, and to each of these the fungus sang the same song, substituting the correct term of address, "Father" or "King" respectively, as required. The elder son was brought and accused. On confession of his crime, he was killed, whereupon the younger son was restored to life.¹

The prevalence of the belief in metempsychosis throughout Northern Guinea is also attested by the Rev. J.L. Wilson, who says,

"The doctrine of transmigration is very common. Hence animals inhabiting certain localities, as the monkeys near Fishtown, crocodiles near Dix Cove, snakes at Whydah, are sacred, because they are supposed to be inhabited by the spirits of the dead. Where a child bears a strong resemblance, physical or mental, to a deceased relative, it is said to have inherited his soul. Native priests pretend to hold intercourse with the spirits of children who are too young to talk, or to make known their wants. Their crying is often attributed to dissatisfaction at the name which has been given them, at the unsuitable nature of their food, or something else of a similar nature."¹.

From the burial customs of the Yorubas, practised by the Oro, Egungun, Elukú, and similar societies, as described in an earlier chapter, we find that they believe in the following doctrines concerning the subject of this chapter, viz:- "The Soul of Man and its Destiny",-

- (1). That man's nature is dual, consisting of body and spirit.
- (2). That while the body perishes, the spirit is imperishable, and is therefore the real essence or personality, being indestructible.
- (3). That death is not the termination of existence, but only a change of state, in which one's identity is preserved. He is still called by the same name.
- (4). That each spirit can identify its own body, or its representative. This appears in Elukú worship, and shows a foundation for the belief in a bodily resurrection, according to the germ theory.
- (5). The spirit of man is immortal. - It can at any time be invoked.

¹. Western Africa, p. 210.

- (6). The spirit of man after death is deified and worshipped. It is interested in the affairs of men. The Yoruba has answered, to his own satisfaction, the question "Do the dead know?"
- (7). That although the spirit-world is unknown to us, it is, nevertheless, accessible to human appeals. Hence, prayer and sacrifice will avail.
- (8). That the spirit, after death, goes back to Him who gave it. This is expressed by the saying O rē ehin, i.e., "He has gone back".
- (9). That there is in this life present reward for good conduct, and present retribution for evil deeds. Oro worship exemplifies this.
- (10). That judgment follows death is shown by the proverbial sayings quoted in Chapter III.

THE END IN VIEW.

We have now to enquire as to the purpose, and the practical results of the belief and worship of the pagan Yoruba. What does he seek from his gods? What does he really obtain as the result of his religion?

Although he may not recognize the fact, he is really seeking after two things. He is endeavouring to solve the mystery of the unseen, to furnish himself with some understanding of the philosophy of the universe, and particularly of his own life. Further, he is seeking to satisfy that divinely implanted desire of the heart of man expressed in the well-known words of Augustine, that our hearts, being made for God, can find no rest until they find rest in Him. But generally our heathen friend does not realize this, and his prayers and sacrifices are, almost without exception, entirely mundane and largely materialistic. He is seeking a physical salvation from present evil. He knows little of the future and prepares for it still less. This is well illustrated by the titles of the chief forms of sacrifice, concerning which we cannot do better than quote again from the late Bishop James Johnson:-

("There)

"There is a great variety of sacrifice, and each prescribed sacrifice, or each set of such a sacrifice, takes its name generally from the object for which it is offered. Among them may be mentioned the following:-- the redemption sacrifice:

the exchange sacrifice:

the wealth and the longevity sacrifice:

the sacrifice for recovery from illness and preventing death:

those for the possession of strength and for the avoiding of losses of any kind:

those for protection against being a cause of trouble to one's own self:

those against being successfully plotted against:

those against a fire accident and for the removal of drought, or the prevention, or the cessation of a flood of rain:

that for attaining to some title and office of dignity, and that for securing a long enjoyment of the office, especially if he who seeks it had been told beforehand through Ifa divination that his enjoyment of it would not be long:

that for securing the sign or mark^{on} one's forehead that would assure him of his safety from the approach and/

and touch of the angel of death, and of victory and triumph over difficulty and trouble; and that for acquiring superiority to others, etc.

These various sacrifices mentioned, being atonement sacrifices, suggest the existence originally in the mind of the pagan Yoruban, that sin and the anger of an offended god are the cause of the various ills incidental to human life: that blessings are only to be had from him and according to his^{will}, and that for this he is to be propitiated by means of sacrifice and offering, since he who desires them is a sinner."

Sacrifices and prayers are also offered for the gift of children. Hunters and travellers invariably offer sacrifices before setting out on an expedition, and are extremely careful, when on that expedition, to refrain from anything that would displease their gods and so spoil their chances of safety and success. A similar custom prevails in East Central Africa.¹

We see then that the whole aim and object of our Yoruba pagan appears to be temporal advantage, prosperity, comfort and peace. Even the sacrifice for the dead (previously

(previously described), seems not so much to be for a removal of his sin and guilt, as to secure for him in the next world a happiness which is materialistic in its conception rather than truly spiritual. There is no personal sense of sin as a loathsome moral disease from which the man desires to be set free¹, no love or desire for holiness for its own sake; no love for the deity as a being who is worthy of love, and who himself loves and delights in his creatures, desiring them to cultivate a holy intimacy with himself. As we have seen, the belief in a Supreme Deity, perfect in Himself and beneficent, is yet of one who is unapproachable, so that there is no conscious desire or expectation of entering into open communion with Him.

It is commonly said "there is good in every religion," but the recognition of this truth does not imply the belief that all religions are equally good, or that every particular religion is entirely good. That there are real advantages to the Yoruba pagan through his religion must be recognized. Some of these are the following:--

The belief, vague and imperfect as it is, in the/

the Supreme Deity, Olurun, as a perfectly good and just Being, even though by many he may be regarded as more or less indifferent to human affairs, is in itself a great asset. It is an example of the truth stated by the Apostle Paul in his speech at Athens, and emphasized in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans, that the true God has "left not Himself without witness." This belief is an incentive to righteousness and, as seen in a previous chapter, holds out some prospect of future retributive justice.

Par. The influence for good of Yoruba paganism is seen in the reverence which it teaches for the gods, and in the general practice, already mentioned, of daily morning worship before any of the day's business is begun. Faith in divine power, guidance, and assistance, is shown by the calling down, through prayer and sacrifice, of those blessings from the hands of the gods, as they are consulted in all important matters.

Next to respect for the deities themselves is the respect which the system teaches for authoritative governments. Not only are fetishes set up to detect and punish evil-doers; but the great secret societies as Oro, Ogboni, Eḷukú, etc., are "powers which be" and must be respected. Dr. Nassau writing on this subject quotes from/

from a Sierra Leone newspaper as follows:--

"The Oro of the Yorubas, the Porro of the Mendis, and the Bondo of the mixed masses who inherit Sherbo-land, have and exercise judicial functions, exemplary and disciplinary in their effects. By their means law and order are observed, to such an extent that many of the unrestrained and rowdy outbursts cowardly indulged in by so-called civilized communities and people are practically unknown."

In the family, filial regard and reverence for, and obedience to parents, on the part of children, is taught and practised, as well as care for them in their old age and in times of sickness, and other times of necessity, however caused. Respect for all aged persons is shown by prefixing to their names the titles "Father," or "Mother." In the pidgin-English of "the Coast," these terms become "Daddy---" or "Mammy---."

Per: Although polygamy is practised the marriage bond is held to be strictly inviolable and to be permanent, wives are to be subject to their husbands, and husbands to care for their wives.

Hospitality is regarded as a sacred duty, especially towards strangers. Any visitor, or "caller", should always/always be entertained with some little gift, e.g., kola-nut, at least. Fidelity in friendship, chastity, truthfulness in speech (although this is constantly disregarded, "to talk Yoruba" being a proverbial expression for "lying.") honesty, kindness, and often courage, are all taught as duties. Murder, theft, and witchcraft, are all punishable by death. Sexual impurity in the married, or unmarried, is a social disgrace and punishable by fines, torture of a certain kind, selling into slavery, and even in some cases (if royalty's honour is concerned) by death. Yoruba heathenism also discountenances, and treats with dishonour, suicide, neglect or refusal of payment of just debts, insolvency, pride, vanity and extravagance.

The motives for the practice of virtue and abstention from wrong-doing are the fear of retributive justice, or the hope of fitting reward, at the hands of the deities, and social disgrace and punishment at the hands of man, this falling not only on the offender, but upon his relatives also. As we have seen, it also gives some hope of life after death.

But after we have allowed for the good there is in the system, we must fully recognize its defects:-

It does not, and cannot, bring man into close touch and communion with a God of love and goodness.

It/

It teaches morality of life; but cannot give the power to practise this. It has no conception of "Divine grace working effectually in them that believe."

It gives no real comfort when the sorrow of death falls upon a home. The awful, blank despair of the heathen at such a time is beyond conception, unless it has been witnessed.

Not only has it these negative defects; but it has great positive evils. The system has been responsible for atrocious and abominable cruelties, self-torture, and torture of unwilling victims, and for countless revolting murders of men, women and children in human sacrifice. It has become the fashion with some writers on the History of Religion to extol (rather than condemn) these things as being "not heartlessness or cruelty--- but obedience to that law of the supernatural which ever claims for itself supremacy over all laws and all passions of the natural man,"¹ to regard them as though they were the supreme sacrifice of hearts which were lovingly and loyally consecrated to the deity concerned! A writer who has never lived among the heathen, still less entered, at least in some degree, into their experiences, thoughts, and feelings, or seen their abominations, may easily fall/

fall into the error of crediting them with high and lofty ideals which only exist in his own cultured mind; but let him live for a few years in "darkest Africa," and he will soon become disillusioned, and be ready to admit the truth of the Psalmist's words that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." He will learn also to confess that the Apostle Paul was not mistaken, when he said "the things which the Gentiles sacrifice they sacrifice to demons (δαίμονious) and not to God" (1 Cor: x. 20); when he sees that they only offer these to turn away the wrath of malicious deities, and themselves take a fiendish delight in their barbarities.

This religious system is also directly responsible for many poisonings, and the black magic of "witchcraft" which has prevailed for so many centuries. These things, and the murders perpetrated through their means, are nearly all done by the "babalawos," or priests, who will (for a consideration) dispose of a man's enemy without exposing their client to any risk.

If we accept the modern view that there is "only one religion" and that all the so-called "religions" are but different manifestations of that one, we must admit that such a manifestation as that of Yoruba paganism is a terribly degenerate and corrupt representation of the true.

CHAPTER XII.

THE WARRANT, OBJECT & METHOD OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Having reviewed the nature and outcome of Yoruba heathenism, we may now consider the subject of Christian missions to its devotees. Are such missions justified? What do they seek to do for the African? How do they, or should they go to work? What are the results?

Some persons have not considered it sufficient to question the justifiability of Christian missions to heathen peoples: they have deliberately denied that there is any such justifiability, and have sought to sustain such denial by the assertion that "the heathen have very good religions of their own". This point of view appears to find a considerable amount of support in some modern works on the History of Religion. An unprejudiced study of the true condition of things in lands where heathenism prevails leads to a very different conclusion. Had we nothing better than their present belief to offer to the pagans of West Africa, there would be some justification for the objection raised by non-Christians, but the loyal follower of the Founder of Christianity would still recognize that the command which Christ gave to His Church "Go ye and make disciples of all nations etc." is binding and must be (obeyed).

obeyed. But, apart from this, the objection is answered by the fact that Christianity offers to the heathen the following advantages above his present religion:--

(1) It gives a clear and definite belief in great truths concerning man, his origin, his life, his destiny, salvation from sin and all trouble--- death not excepted--- thus removing the terrible uncertainty and despair which paganism involves. It reveals God as a loving Father who actively cares for his children.

(2) It renews and brightens man's present life, not only by setting before him high ideals of morality and holiness, but by providing the power to live accordingly; through a living personal Saviour and Friend.

(3) It holds out a blessed and certain prospect of future and eternal happiness undreamt of in heathenism.

The true object of Christian missions has at times been somewhat obscured. Missionaries have sometimes acted too much as though the object were to civilize and Europeanize the natives of heathen countries, and not a few of those natives have seemed to suppose that the acceptance of Western customs of clothing, education etc., constituted the acceptance of Christianity. It is now, however, increasingly recognized that the one great object/object is to evangelize and Christianize the peoples of these lands and to leave them, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of God, to organize their own Church life in accordance with the needs and circumstances of their own lands and ~~circumstances~~ ^{environment.} This has been particularly the experience in West African missions.

Whereas the early converts generally took a European name and wore at least one article of European dress, now-a-days African names are preferred, and African dress largely worn, especially in the interior.

The modern Christian missionary does not begin work by methods calculated to antagonize. He does not say "Your religion is all wrong! I come to set you right." His first aim is to win the confidence of the people, and when he begins to teach, he lays hold of the elements of truth in their present belief, which are common to them and him, and so develops those elements that he can lead up to the revelation of God as a God of love in the mission of Jesus Christ. The following outline is typical of many interviews held and visits paid by the writer:-

Knocking at the door, or standing in the gateway of a dwelling the visitor calls out "Ago-le ô!" and receives the reply "Ago ya!" -- Permission thus asked and obtained/obtained for entrance, salutations are exchanged, and a silent look of enquiry on the part of the host, or hostess, indicates "What is the object of your call?" The missionary then says "I come to speak to you the words of God (Olurun)!---"That is very good. We are glad to hear." Then the visitor appeals to the customary sayings about ^{God,} enlarges upon His goodness and love, and after quoting their own proverbial sayings, leads on to His hatred of sin and all evil, and His love in sending His own Son, who offered one great all-sufficient sacrifice, so that none other is needed. Then he tells of the personal love and grace of God, desiring each of His human creatures to come to Him for blessing, life and salvation.

The missionary of to-day uses any lawful means to exemplify the great truth he comes to proclaim, remembering always that his life is the most powerful witness of the power of his message. He uses, therefore, the witness of a true Christian philanthropy, in relieving the sick and suffering, providing for outcast lepers, orphaned children, and others who are uncared for by the heathen generally. Amazement is expressed that a white lady, or gentleman, should wash and tend the ulcerated legs of a slave, or adopt a motherless infant whom/whom nobody wants! In time they learn to realize that there is a wonderful motive to which they have been entire strangers,-- "the love of Christ constraineth us." Educational and industrial mission work are likewise exemplary, as well as remedial.

The results of modern missionary work vary greatly in different countries, and it is not the purpose of this treatise to give them in general. The examples which follow are adduced as evidences of the justification of Christian Missions in the country whose religion has been described.

Frequent mention has been made of the babalawos, of priests of Ifà, who are the highest authorities in Yoruba heathendom. They are the shrewdest and most intellectual of their race, profound thinkers, and of great subtlety and knowledge. They are pre-eminently responsible for the cruelties and evil deeds already referred to. It is, then, no slight token to the power and value of Christian truth, when one of these men accepts Christ as his Saviour and consecrates his life to His service. There were two such men personally known to the writer;--

(1) Fadipé was a babalawo living in Abeokuta. As he crossed over a rocky hill one day and sat down to rest, a Christian native likewise sat down, and presently entered/entered into conversation with the babalawo. As he told him of the Saviour, the priest became deeply interested, and the outcome was his acceptance of Christ. He then devoted his life to farming at a place called Iṣan, a country district in the "bush," ^{many miles} from Abeokuta. Having learned to read, he felt he could not leave his neighbours and friends in ignorance of God's great love, and as he had formerly led them astray, so now he must lead them to Christ. He began to conduct services for them. Numbers came every Sabbath. There were ten young men who walked a great distance, some a three hours' journey (six hours, including the return), to be present each week. This work so spread and extended that it became a great centre of "farm-station" work. It was, of course, entirely voluntary, unpaid labour on the part of the converted babalawo. His only library was his Yoruba bible, prayer-book and hymn-book.

(2) Agbede, or "Shadrach," was another converted babalawo. His life was a very different one from that of Fadipé. Whereas the latter practised social Christianity, Agbede was a strict ascetic, almost a recluse. After the death of his wife, he lived entirely alone. On his conversion to Christianity, he became a blacksmith (Agbede = "Blacksmith") and worked at his trade four days a week, giving up Sunday, Wednesday/

Wednesday and Saturday entirely to preaching. He also erected a platform, as an open-air pulpit, outside his house, and used to get up and preach at any hour of the night. His voice would carry a great distance in the silence of the night and some marvellous results followed his preaching. Eventually he gave up his whole time to preaching and supported himself simply by growing a few vegetables on which he lived. From being a very prosperous "consultant" (for a babalawo's profession is very lucrative), he voluntarily adopted a life of extreme poverty, that he might give his whole time to preaching the gospel. He always refused to accept any gift (except that, now and again, if a missionary said "Agbèdè, God told me to give you this", he would do so) and never took any food but what his own hands had prepared:-- this, probably, because he knew only too well of the great skill and subtlety/African poisoners.

When questioned by anyone as to his course of action (e.g. preaching at night), he would invariably answer "God told me to do this, and what He tells me I must do." After some years, he left Ibadan and went to live in, and preach at, his native place, a town in a remote district, where there was no other Christian witness./

witness. These two men, while strongly holding that the system they had followed was evil and Satanic, remained thoroughly loyal to their former associates and never divulged any of their secrets.

The character of Native Christian Churches in the mission field has often been slanderously maligned. The truth is, that, generally speaking, they will compare most favourably with average Christian Churches in the home countries, e.g.,

In Lagos (the sea-port of Yoruba-land), in 1892, the number of Christians in the Protestant Episcopal (Church of England) Native Church was about 3,300. These supported six churches, eight native clergymen, a school (with paid schoolmaster) in connection with each church, various other local works, and had their own missionary society, sending out about twelve native missionaries to the surrounding heathen districts. All this was maintained by the free-will offerings of the native Christians. Where should we find a parish of 3,300, in Great Britain, doing anything like so much? And to crown all, in the year referred to, when the country of Ijebu (which had always refused to allow any Christian to enter, or even to pass through it) was thrown open, and the people/people begged to have Christian teachers sent, and an urgent enabled appeal was sent to the Church Missionary Society in London (then the greatest Protestant Missionary Society in the world), and the response was a confession of inability to give any help, the Lagos Church Missions supplied the need. A mass missionary meeting was held in Lagos to consider the appeal from Ijebu, and it was decided that the Lagos Church Missions would undertake the work, and at that meeting two native missionaries were appointed and enough money subscribed to support them for the next three years. The result was, in a few years' time, a spiritual "revival" and mass movement in Ijebu which would compare not unfavourably with the better known one in Uganda.

Many other proofs could be adduced by way of narrative, or statistics, to show how the results in Yoruba-land fully justify Christian Missions to its pagan peoples.-- The instances given have been selected as showing the psychological effect of spiritual Christianity upon men who had previously been sunk in a debased paganism.

CHAPTER XIII.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Science knows no finality. It is, and must ever be, progressive. The scientific student, whether in the physical, mental or religious sphere, must always keep an open mind, and be ready to advance upon his previous knowledge, even although the discovery of fresh facts may involve the renunciation of cherished hypotheses and modification of accepted theories.

In the scientific study of religion, our present state of knowledge is so limited, that, whatever our personal opinions may be, it is hardly wise to dogmatize, and distinctly unwise to ignore, or depreciate, evidence which is not favourable to our own theory.

In connection with the subject of this treatise there arise various questions of considerable, but varying importance, which the writer does not feel called upon to attempt to answer; partly, because limitation of space does not allow of adequate discussion, and also, because, while eminent writers have dealt with these topics at great length, general agreement seems far from attainment at the present time. The facts of West

African belief and practice are here presented, with an indication of the trend of the evidence they furnish. This is compared, to some extent, with that of similar beliefs in other regions and among other races, in the hope that their cumulative testimony may be found to be not wholly without value in seeking a solution of the questions which arise.

Is it true that there is "only one religion", or are there many?¹ Should the "History of Religion" be regarded as a distinct study from that of "Comparative Religion"? What is the truth as to the "Origin of Religion"? Did man first conceive magic, and from that develop religious ideas? Did he successively pass through the stages of fetishism, totemism, the higher and lower nature-worship, animism, humanism (Euhemerism), - and, if so, which came first? Or, was his first religious conception monotheistic? If so, how did this come to him? Was it by

1. Carpenter, J.E. - Comparative Religion, p.34.
 Menzies, - History of Religion, pp.4 sq.

a "Divine revelation"? Or, has he certain "innate ideas" implanted by his Creator? Are his religious conceptions the simple working out of his mental constitution through "psychological necessity"?¹ -- As has already been said, we cannot attempt here to answer any one of these questions; but can only briefly review some leading features of our study, in so far as they bear upon them, candidly facing the facts of the case, and indicating some of the parallels in the religious belief of other tribes.

We have seen that the Yorubas recognize four distinct classes of spiritual beings,² viz:--

- (1) A Supreme Being, infinitely good, and unique.
- (2) A multitude of lesser deities, called Orishas.
- (3) The spirits of the dead. (Ancestor-worship, &c.)
- (4) An evil spirit, who takes precedence of all those in Class 2, and who inspired the leading Orisha, Ifà.

Scientifically, these four classes fall into two divisions:-- Classes 2, 3, and 4 comprise a full system of polydemonism, or "Animism", not in Dr Tylor's narrower sense of the word, but in its widest application. -- The

1. Menzies, Op. cit. pp. 26sq. Brinton, Rel. of Prim. Peoples, pp. 8, 9, 142, 214sq.

2. This classification is the writer's own, but has been submitted to, and repeatedly endorsed by natives.

Supreme Being of Class 1 is entirely left out of the Yoruba Animistic system, from which the belief in Him is quite distinct, and to which it is clearly antecedent. It is plainly the remnant of an ancient Monotheism.¹ The evidence shows that

- (1) There is a vast distance between the highest orisha and the Supreme Deity. - If the latter is a development of animism, why is there no trace of any connection?
- (2) The Supreme Being is not worshipped, but left in the background.-How is this to be reconciled with the opinion that belief in Him is a development of the lower faith? The opposite result should be found, if that were the case.
- (3) The belief in the Supreme Being is most jealously kept and guarded by the oldest and highest of the heathen priests, men who have never come under any

¹. Some might prefer to put Classes 1 & 4 into the second division, substituting Dualism for Monotheism, as in the Zoroastrian system. Col. Ellis suggests that Yoruba religion began with nature-worship, and developed a Dualism in which Obàtálá (or perhaps Ifà) was opposed by Eshù. But the writer maintains that the "Devil" (i.e., Eshù, who inspired Ifà) belongs rather to the Animistic system. This is shown in the devil-worship of the hill tribes of India, and of the Battaks of the Indian Archipelago. Warneck, Living Forces of the Gospel, p.117.

Christian influence. There is no support for the suggestion of those who propose that the conception of a Supreme Deity is due to the influence of Mohammedanism or of European Christianity. This point of evidence is strongly supported by the ancient Yoruba lyric poem, Odu Ofunsa, given in full in Appendix A, which is of great importance.

Similar evidence comes from other parts of Africa, from India, the Indian Archipelago, and from Central Australia, of which specimens are now produced:-

Mrs Talbot writes of the tribes of the Lower Niger, "It is indisputable that the Ibibios occupy a low rung on the ladder of culture.....Yet, to our minds at least, it would appear that their present condition is due to a gradual descent from a very different state of things. Fragments of legend and half-forgotten ritual still survive to tell of times shrouded in the mists of antiquity, when the despised Ibibio of today was a different being, dwelling not amid the fog and swamp of fetishism, but upon the sunlit heights of a religious culture hardly less highly evolved perhaps than that of Ancient Egypt."¹

The Rev. E. Hayward, of the Central Sudân, says "The idea of the existence of a God is very vague in the land of the Maghavul. They say that Nan...made the earth and the sky; but that after He had made it, He left it and went very far away, so far indeed that He has never been seen or heard of since. The place to which He went is Deng-Nan, or Ting-Nan, literally, the place above which belongs to God."¹.

Dr R. H. Nassau, whose position as an expert scientist, as well as a theologian, makes his testimony specially weighty, after over forty years' experience among the tribes of the Ogowé and Gaboon regions, states his view as follows:-

"I see nothing to justify the theory of Menzies, that primitive man, or the untutored African of today, in worshipping a tree, a snake, or an idol, originally worshipped those very objects themselves, and that the suggestion that they represented, or were even the dwelling-place of, some spiritual Being is an after-thought, up to which he has grown in the lapse of the ages. The rather I see every reason to believe that the thought of the Being, or Beings, as an object of worship, has come down by tradition, and by direct revelation from Jehovah Himself."².

². Fetichism in West Africa, p. 48.

Herr Warneck, writing of the Battaks of the Indian Archipelago, assumes that "there is in the popular consciousness the remains of a purer idea of God, alongside and above the recognition of a plurality of gods, a view also that cannot be derived from those. Belief in God had been reduced by nature-worship, fear of spirits and moral coarseness, to a state in which it was no longer recognizable. The host of spirits, born of fear, thrust themselves between God and man, and left behind that faded image of God, which still throws a faint shadow on the feelings of the people... The idea of God is dimly preserved; the worship of God is almost entirely lost."¹ And, again, he writes,

"The animistic heathen are, in point of fact, ἄθεοι, without God, not in the sense of the fool who says there is no God, not even in the sense of the evil-doer, who, to sin undisturbed, has, against the witness of his conscience, burned the thought of God out of his soul. They have lost God and are ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι τῆς ἰωῆς τοῦ θεοῦ (Eph. iv. 18). Between them and Him there has grown up a thick primeval forest, through which they can no longer find their way, and which they have no power to root up."²

Even Dr Estlin Carpenter, while writing strongly on the side of evolution, admits that "isolated groups, such as the Australians, the Todas of India, or the Veddas of Ceylon, seem to be in the last stages of stagnation or decay."¹

Dr Menzies writes "the bushmen of Australia, the Andaman Islanders, and others, are found to be in such a state in points of habits and acquirements that they must be considered as races which have fallen from a higher position, and present instances of degeneration."² He says, again, "Religion and civilization go hand in hand, and if civilization can decay (and leading anthropologists declare that the debased tribes of Australia and West Africa show signs of a higher civilization they have lost) then religion also may decay.....The races among whom fetishism is found exhibit a well-known feature of the decadence of religion, namely, that the great god or gods have grown weak and faint, and smaller gods and spirits have crowded in to fill up the blank thus caused. Worship is transferred from the great beings who are the original gods of the tribe and whom it still professes in a vague way to believe, to numerous smaller beings, and from the good gods to the bad."³

³ Op. cit. p. 38.

Dr Andrew Lang in his work, the Making of Religion, strongly maintains "the conception of a Supreme, or practically Supreme, Being, from the lowest stages of human culture up to Christianity", and complains that "Anthropology has taken for granted that the Supreme Deities of savages have been envisaged by them as 'spirits'. This, (he says) paradoxical as the statement may appear, is just what does not seem to be proved, as we shall show."¹ He also says, "Nothing can be less scientific than to snatch up any traveller's tale which makes for our theory, and to ignore evidence, perhaps earlier, or later, or better observed, which makes against it." He points to Huxley and Spencer as failing in this respect.²

Dr F. B. Jevons bears similar testimony.³

We have found strong evidence among the Yorubas of a primitive monotheistic belief, of which there are at least traces, more or less distinct, among other races whose religion is animistic. We find also a remarkable similarity in other matters of belief and practice. The Yoruba ogùn ("medicine") corresponds to the Melanesian mana, and the Iroquois orenda. In the practice of sympathetic magic, the Yoruba Apeta has been shown in an earlier chapter to be closely similar to the Arung-quiltha of the Australian blacks and the black magic of the Matabele of South Africa. Sir J. G. Frazer, in his monumental work, The Golden Bough, tells us of similar practices in India, Ceylon, among the Moslems of North Africa, in ancient Egypt and Babylon, and even in the Scottish Highlands in the present day.¹ Another parallel is found in the use of the "bull-roarer" (the Yoruba Oro-stick), in various lands, even those so distant from Africa as Australia and North-west America. The only other religious practice we need here refer to as being likewise found in other countries where Animism prevails is that of human sacrifice.

How are we to account for the remarkable similarity of religious belief among animistic peoples so far separated as those named above? Dr Brinton truly says that "the earliest and simplest religions of the world deal with nearly the same objective facts in nearly the same subjective fashion, the differences being due to local and temporal causes."² Dr Menzies has stated that

Religions of Primitive Peoples.

"The theory that man was originally civilized and humane, and that it was by a fall, by a degeneration from that earliest condition, that the state of savagery made its appearance, is now generally abandoned."¹ Dr Estlin Carpenter says of "the modern conception of evolution" that "it is on this great idea that the whole study of the history of religion is now firmly established. At the foundation of all endeavours to classify the multitudinous facts which it embraces, lies the conviction that whatever may be the occasional instances of degeneration or decline, the general movement of human things advances from the cruder and less complex to the more refined and developed."²

Now it is a remarkable fact that, while the majority of those who have written on the general subject of the History of Religion have accepted the evolutionary hypothesis, it is equally true that those who, as missionaries, have spent the greater part of their lives in closest intimacy with the heathen have almost invariably taken the opposite view. Dr Nassau, after over forty years experience, a doctor of medicine as well as of divinity, states his opinion in these words, "As to the source of theological knowledge, all our other knowledge is evolved, systematized and developed by patient experiment and investigation. The results of any particular branch of knowledge are cumulative and are enlarged and perfected from generation to generation. But the source of our knowledge of God is not in us, any more than our spiritual life had its source in ourselves. It came ab extra. God breathed into the earthly form of Adam the breath of life, and he became a living creature, essentially and radically different from the beasts over which he was given dominion. Knowledge of God was thus an original, donated, component part of us.....To account for the religious nature in man by evolution I regard as a thing that cannot be done.....Immortality cannot be evolved out of mortality."¹ Herr Warneck writes "I have worked as a missionary for many years in intimate contact with thousands of the adherents of animistic heathenism, and I have been convinced that the determining force of that heathenism is hostile to God.....The attitude of heathenism towards the Christian religion, always hostile, suggests that it divines an enemy, not a superior brother."²

² The Living Forces of the Gospel, pp.10,11.

Dr W. St Clair Tisdall, who is not only a missionary of many years experience in India and Persia, but also an oriental scholar of high standing, writes "If Christianity is not a Divine Revelation, but merely a development of earlier and purely human religious systems, as Dr Frazer, Herbert Spencer, Dr Tylor, and perhaps the majority of modern writers on Comparative Religion more or less openly assert, how is it that, while all religions except the Christian (and, as already pointed out, its preliminary stage, Judaism) consecrated the most abominable vices, Christianity from the very first opposed them? Why was not Christianity accepted and welcomed throughout the Roman Empire, as were such faiths as those of Cybele, Isis, and Mithra, for example? If the origin of all religions is one and the same, how was it that the most enlightened men - (an Antoninus, a Seneca, a Pliny - as well as the most ignorant and abandoned of idol-worshippers, bitterly opposed the Christian faith, and that faith alone, too often persecuting its professors to the death, while welcoming all other varieties of religion?"¹.

Now the testimony and opinion of men of the standing

and experience of the three last quoted are not to be lightly brushed aside by such bald assertions as those contained in the two extracts which immediately precede them. Dr Menzies is not correct in saying that the "theory" which they still uphold is "generally abandoned". Dr Carpenter's words appear to be nothing less than a frank admission that he, and those who side with him are unable to form an impartial judgement on the great question at issue, since they come to their study not with a mere bias in favour of one side, but with a settled "conviction"! Neither science nor religion has anything to fear from a candid and earnest enquiry and search for truth, but no advance in true knowledge can be made by "begging the question" at the outset. This is very different from assuming a "working hypothesis" which we are prepared to discard, should our discoveries show that it is incorrect.

The writer is of opinion that until the religion of the various heathen tribes has been more intelligently studied at first hand by those living among them and speaking their languages, and the evidence fairly and impartially weighed, the evolutionary theory of the Origin of Religion should be regarded as an hypothesis which still remains to be effectually demonstrated.

APPENDIX A.

AN ANCIENT YORUBA RELIGIOUS HYMN.

In the second volume of the Nigerian Chronicle, No. 21, dated April 8th, 1910, there is given, by the learned and painstaking writer "Adesola", (who is now revealed as the Rev. E.T. Johnson, a Yoruba clergyman) a translation of a remarkable and very ancient lyric. It is really a religious poem on the Fall and Redemption of Man. Mr Johnson gives it as chanted by an old Ifà priest. He tells us that it is "about the oldest of the religious poems of the Yoruba people", and says that "from internal evidence, the composition dated several centuries before the Birth of Christ"..... "The facts therein related point to remoter ages, and it is regarded as the Yoruba version of the story of the Garden of Eden, Man's Fall, and his Redemption." He says also (apparently on the authority of the old priest, as well as the internal evidence of the poem) - "Their religion was monotheism. Throughout the whole Odu there is no trace of fetich-worship. In times of disaster they consult the will of God by some oracular means..... The Ifè here spoken of is not the modern Ifè." -- This should be carefully noted. The site of the ancient Ifè is quite unknown. -- A full copy of the translation is now given:-

SCENE I. The Divination Room.
(Enter Elders from the different federated states of Ifè-land, to ascertain cause of national calamity).

ORACULAR RESPONSE.

"If the globe be unhinged from its orbit,
And the solid earth from pole to pole be rent,
If this orb in our age lose its balance,-
'Tis that we have erred from the right'.

So the oracle to the suppliants declared,
Who have come from the Federated States,
The Will of God to know,
When Ifè-land lost her first estate.

SCENE II. Poet-priest depicting events in the Assembly Hall.
(Priest from the State summoned by the Elders to offer sacrifice to propitiate divine wrath).

"OLOLA from the city Ado they summoned,
To restore Ifè to her lost estate:
He came (a mighty priest),
He tried, but failed to achieve it.

"To the city Owo, to ERINMI the priest,
The invitation was next extended,
To restore Ifè to her lost estate:
He came (a mightier priest),
He tried, but failed to achieve it.
Though Ado is wise Ifa's abode,
And Owo the seat of sapient Elu,
Yet the wisdom of these sages failed them,
Their efforts were quite unavailing.

" Post-speed, a new-commissioned mandate
 To ÒGÚN in the city of Ire,
 To bring him quick to Ifè,
 To help restore her estate.
 He came, (a mighty priest) -
 He tried, but failed to achieve it.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

"Men famish for lack of bread,
 No crop,
 No rain, there was:
 A bitter wail from man and beasts--
 'Who will restore Ifè to her lost estate?'
 Loud spoke a voice and said,
 You have not consulted with OBALUFON of Iyinde,
 And LABERINJO of Ido,
 With JIGJURE of Otunmoba, and ESEGBA, the high priest of the Egbas,
 Who was the first to lead men to the confines of Egba-land,
 With ASADA, the priest of Ijesha,
 AKODA of Ifè, and ASEDA,
 The great high-priest of all in Ifè-land: -
 They came, they tried:
 But all their efforts were unavailing.

"And now they had to send to AKON ILOGBON,¹
 And sought an approach to AFONAHANI,²
 That they help to restore Ifè to her lost estate.

"These sages came and advised that OLÔTỌ ENIA,³ who resides in the land of Arufin,⁴
 Be summoned to trumpet the Ala jogun,⁵
 That he may invoke the Olofin,⁶
 My lord, the Ajalaiye, and also
 To invoke my lord, the Ajalorun,
 As well as my lord, the Agirilogbon,
 The child born on the hill Itase,
 Whence the day begins to dawn,
 For he alone can restore Ifè to her lost estate.

(The Trumpet sounds).

"Why call you me to your world?" - OLÔTQ ENIA came and spoke.
 The reply came forth, 'We have called you,
 Thou 'Perfect Man',
 That you may trumpet to the Alajogun,
 And he to the Oju.⁷
 OLOTQ ENIA refused: 'I shall not blow':
 'Why not blow?' said they,
 'Does not the Squirrel trump for the Boa?'
 'I shall not blow', said he:
 'Does not the Toad trump for the Viper?'
 And again he replied, 'I shall not blow.'
 'Does not the Woodcock trump for Neptune?'
 And the Akuko⁸ for the Mermaids?
 The Oloburo alone can carol to the man of heaven,
 And you, the "Perfect Man" alone, can
 And were ever wont to blow to the Alajogun.'

(The Trumpet sounds, and the

A GENERAL EXODUS OF MAN AND BEAST FROM IFE.

"At the sound of the trump of the 'Perfect Man',
 A great commotion arose in the earth.
 Elephants rushed to their homes in the woods:
 The buffalos betook themselves to the wilds:
 The winged fowls to their kingdom;
 The reptiles to their homes:
 The great giants to their regions by the sea.
 Dogs to the dog-land,
 Sheep to the sheep-land:
 The brute creation to their respective haunts:
 Each race of man to his respective claim.
 That was the day of great confusion,
 When men and beasts dispersed,

And all great birds betook themselves to flight,
 And our belongings got scattered here and there.
 'This is parting for ever', said my father,
 'Yes, for ever', said I:
 'Is it a question of breaches?'
 'Yes, of breaches', said I.
 A breach here and a breach there,
 Which oft disturb the lunar months.

THE DIVINE BEINGS IN COUNCIL.

"From my lord the Olofin Ajalaye,
 From my lord the Olofin Ajalorun,
 From my lord the 'Man of Perfect Wisdom',
 A child born on the hill Itase,
 Whence the day begins to dawn,
 Came the Oracular response, -
 'To bring back peace to Ife and restore her to her lost estate,
 You needs must have Ewe Alasuwalu, (Man's character-remodelling leaf).
 Go, fetch the leaf at once,
 Ere peace to the world be restored.

(Mankind went in search of the leaf from different parts, and brought what appeared to them to be it).

"'Lo, here is one, my Lord', they said:
 'This cannot be', the 'Man of Perfect Wisdom' replied:
 'And here is another, my Lord', quoth they:
 'This, too, cannot be', was the quick reply.
 Again said the 'Man of Perfect Wisdom',
 Why do you mortals not confess to your filth and nakedness?
 And I purify and clothe you?'

THE CONFESSION.

"Then all replied: 'We
 O Lord, to our filth and nakedness confess:
 Do Thou purify and clothe us'.

THE MAN OF PERFECT WISDOM PRODUCED THE LEAF.

"So he dipped his hand into the bag of mystery,
And brought out the healing leaf.
There was universal joy and merriment:
Men sang aloud and danced,
'We have received the healing balm,
Oh, Heavenly Prince, re-model us as Thou wilt,
We have received the healing leaf,
Thou Heavenly Prince, re-model our lives as Thou wilt.'

"On that day it was that the rain fell, and the World of Ifè was restored to her lost estate."

APPENDIX B.

EXCURSUS.-- The ORIGIN of the YORUBA TRIBES.

Attention may be called to certain facts which have come to light in the course of our study and to the value of their cumulative testimony, although the value of that testimony may be very differently regarded by different observers. It is, however, obvious that any light we can obtain on the history of a people is of value in tracing the origin of their religion, and if certain features in their religion throw light on their origin the use of this evidence is not necessarily "arguing in a circle".

Traditions. It has been pointed out (in Chapter I) that the bulk of traditional testimony among the Yorubas is in favour of their having migrated from the North-east. Similar traditions prevail among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast (Col. Ellis), and also among the Bantu races of the Gaboon and Congo regions.

Myths. (1). Flood-myths. There are several versions of a Deluge, in which one man is always prominent, also a bird, and a tree. The writer heard these when living in the country. They are also alluded to, or quoted, by Col. Ellis¹ and by Mr Dennett². Some of these describe the visitation (as in Genesis) as one in which "the rain was upon the earth", others as being due to the anger of Olokun, the sea-god, who caused the sea to arise and flood the land, (as Genesis again) i.e. "the fountains of the great deep were broken up". (2). Ifà-myth. The Ifa-myth (recorded in Chapter IV) has remarkable resemblances to the story of the Fall in Genesis, ch. iii. - The object in view was to obtain knowledge, this knowledge was supplied through Eshu, or Eleggba, (Satan), it was given through a woman who received the nuts or fruit from a tree. (3). Obatalá-myth. With the possible exception of Ifa, Obatalá is ^{the} highest and best of the orishas, and he was associated with Olurun in the work of creation. He is sometimes even spoken of as Omo-Olorun, i.e., "Son of God". He is entirely a good and beneficent deity. (It is true that some of the myths give a lower view of him, but myths handed down solely by oral tradition always vary greatly). His work in creation may be compared with the Hebrew conception of the agency of the Word (Memra) of God, the Divine Logos, the Lord Christ, in the work of creation (Proverbs viii, 27-31, St. John i, 3, Hebrews i, 2). The story of his voluntary ascension into heaven (Chapter IV) may be connected with that of Enoch.

Customs and Idioms of the Yorubas. Some of the customs and idioms of these people are similar to those of the Semitic race, as exemplified in the primitive and patriarchal times of the Hebrews; e.g., the position of heads of families, customs of social life, the right of any wayfarer to satisfy his immediate hunger by plucking the produce of his neighbour's farm, but not to take anything away (Deut xxiii, 24, 25), the idiom expressing intensity or emphasis, "dying thou shalt die" (Gen. ii, 17) etc.

Sacrifices of the Yorubas. These have many close parallels with those of the Hebrews, as has been indicated in Chapter VIII. Some, like the burnt-offering of the Levitical code, are entirely consumed by fire, and the ashes collected and taken out on to a public road, with which we may compare the "clean place" of the Hebrews. In other cases "the blood of a sacrificial victim is

"sprinkled first upon the right lintel, which is sacred to the Alabà, and then upon the left lintel, which is sacred to the Alasè, and after this upon the surface of the door hanging upon one of them." (Bishop J. Johnson). The similarity of this to the ritual of the Jewish Passover is patent. In the sacrifice offered (only occasionally) to Ipori, it has been noted that blood and oil are applied to the worshipper's great toe. This accords with the consecration of the Hebrew priest and of the leper who was cleansed, under the Mosaic code (Lev. viii, 23, 24, & xiv, 14, 17). It has also been shown (in Chapter VIII) that there are similar ritual practices to those of the "Scape-goat" and the "heave-offering" of the Hebrews.

These various resemblances to Hebrew religious customs and legislation, particularly when taken in conjunction with the native tradition of immigration from the East, or North-east, have considerable cumulative force. While they do not necessarily imply any trace of Semitic descent, they would seem to indicate that the Semitic Hebrews and the Negritic Yorubas belong to branches which at some early stage were united to a common stem, and (whether this is so or not) it is very possible, if not probable, that Hebrew and early Christian influence have many centuries ago been brought down through the Sudân; but the traces of Christian influence which may be found are too faint and too degenerate to have been introduced by European voyagers to the West Coast.

Since writing the above Excursus, the writer has found in the late Rev. J. L. Wilson's book, Western Africa, which has already been several times quoted from, the following passage,

"Mixed up with these pagan notions and customs, there are many obvious traces of Judaism, both in Northern and Southern Guinea; and in the latter some undoubted traces of a corrupted form of Christianity, which have probably travelled across the continent from ancient Ethiopia, where Christianity was once firmly established." He instances also "bloody sacrifices, with the sprinkling of blood upon their altars and door-posts, the formal and ceremonial observance of new moons, etc."¹.
