Out of sight [videorecording] - London : Brook Production for BBC, 1991.

(Madness ; ep. 2.)

Traces the rise and fall of the asylum from the mostly private "madhouse" of the 18th century, to the overcrowded institutions of the 19th and 20th centuries where squalor and inhumane mechanical restraint were the norm. The arrival of drugs in the 1950's saw the beginning of the end, and since then asylums have been emptying, returning patients to the streets where many of them fare little better than their medieval predecessors.

Brainwaves [videorecording] - London : Brook Production for BBC, 1991.

(Madness ; ep. 3.)

Describes some of the often barbarous techniques that have been used to bring the malfunctioning brain back into working order, for example, insulin and metrazol injections, psychosurgery, electroconvulsive therapy and drugs. After more than one hundred years of searching for explanations of madness in the brain, knowledge remains fragmented and uncertain.

The Talking cure [videorecording] - London : Brook Production for BBC, 1991.

(Madness ; ep. 4.)

Examines the vast array of psychological perspectives and treatments that have developed since Freud, all of them agonistic to physical explanations of madness and seeking to cure by using talk as a means of entering and altering the hidden labyrinths of the human mind.

In two minds [videorecording] - London : Brook Production for BBC, 1991.

(Madness ; ep. 5.)

Poses the question as to whether madness is an illness in the medical sense, or a variation of the human condition which should never have become the business of doctors in the first place. Uses the conflict of opinion over the definition of schizophrenia as an example of the general confusion which exists.
