PREFACE

This bibliography updates and enlarges on an earlier one, 'A preliminary bibliography of modern corporatism', Sussex Working papers in Corporatism, No. 1, April 1983. Most of the additional references have been compiled by John Ballard; assistance with the first version from James Simmie and Andrew Doak is gratefully acknowledged.

It would have been more complete had we been able to incorporate material in languages other than English; a good deal of important material on pre-war and modern corporatism is left out. Other commitments forced this decision, but we hope that the appearance of this bibliography may prompt others to attempt a similar task for material in other languages.

The bibliography does not pretend to be definitive (it is not the bibliography of corporatism); it has been produced to be a useful resource for those working in the field, or new to the field. For the latter, in particular, it is worth saying something about the criteria for inclusion. 'Corporatism' admits of a number of different interpretations and approaches (see item 1088 for a useful summary of these), and any one could generate sufficient material for a bibliography on its own. For example, the involvement of the 'peak' organisations of business and labour in negotiating macro-economic policy could be taken as a starting point for amassing material on incomes policies, on economic planning, on demand management, on industrial relations and so on. The section on 'interests and corporate groups' could be expanded indefinitely into a vast range of material on interest groups. Whilst this would be relevant to a discussion of corporatism, it does not itself comprise that discussion. We have chosen a more restrictive strategy: to confine our selections to material in which a concept of corporatism (or sometimes what we judge to be its equivalent under another name) is explicitly used.

We have classified the material in three ways: by theme, by geographical area or country, and in the final section, by isolating the 'old' from the 'new' corporatism. Material published before the war which relates to the economic problems and/or the organisation of interests in capitalist democracies is included in the first two sections. Any system of classification is in some respects arbitrary, and ours is no exception. In particular, the first section on 'general and theoretical works' includes also thematic works which did not fit into the other categories. In any later edition some of these might need to be regrouped into separate sections.

We have not cross-referenced between sections in the belief that the bibliography is still short enough to make this unnecessary. If the literature continues to expand at its current rate this judgement may have to be revised! The addition of an author index will, we hope, help readers to pinpoint a good deal of material fairly quickly, although obviously it will be of less use to those new to the literature.

TECHNICAL NOTE

This bibliography has been prepared on a Sinclair ZX Spectrum computer. The citations have been stored, sorted, indexed and printed using the Masterfile program by Campbell Systems.
