

Albrecht Dürer: changes in his artwork during the Reformation

Tory L. Schendel

IU School of Liberal Arts, 425 University Blvd, Cavanaugh Hall 329,
Indianapolis, IN, 46202

Mentor: Daniel Nützel

The research conducted is to explain the stylistic changes that occurred in Albrecht Dürer's art during the transitioning period from medieval to Renaissance. By acquiring Dürer's Nachlass [private diary] from the IU Lily Library and reading literature from the top medieval and Renaissance specialists, such as David Price, Andrew Morrall, and Erwin Panofsky, the influence stemmed from Dürer's new found faith in Lutheranism. No longer did Dürer focus solely on monograms, he introduced the art of triptychs. Studies believe that Dürer only created triptychs while working in Giovanni Bellini's workshop, but this study allots reasoning to the Reformation.

The study was sponsored by IU School of Liberal Arts Lunsford Scholarship.