Departure

By Adrienne Violand

I'll be flying from Columbus on the twenty-fifth.
You could come see me off, I'm sure if time allows us to hold on to coffee stains on lab reports with notes in the margins. Notes I've noted over the months; your breath and mine.
Two lines running parallel for a while.

I don't think we knew each other last year, but now I've seen you: a cup of coffee, a pregnancy scare, and broken glass with hairline cracks running away from the point of contact, but still intact. Still intact.
The letters rolled out of your mouth,

I breathed them in easy, even though they sometimes scraped against my throat.
Scrapes that made sure my immune system was in perfect working order.
Though my tongue swells and twitches and my restless legs call me away, I'll remember

to pack my bags with community fries, Ramen (so much Ramen), and burnt popcorn—You'll still find pieces in your sheets a week from now.
Pieces that are like a tattoo you forgot was on your ankle and every time you rediscover it, you notice another detail you missed before.
Pieces of popcorn that I'll take with me.

I'll be flying from Columbus on the twenty-fifth, but this is just a test run. I know in a year we'll be lapping up job applications. We'll go out and buy staplers even though staples don't always hold. They'll hand us each a piece of paper and shake our hands.
