How do Physicians talk about Death?

Although scholarly conversations about death and dying have been taking place for more than 50 years, there is still a lot that we do not know. The biggest gap is that we do not really know what physicians were taught in medical school or the tools they were given to cope with these challenges as they progress into their career.

My research will work with physicians to gain a better understanding of the conversations they have with patients around death and dying. The goal is to build educational opportunities to support physicians in their approaches to death and dying in their practice.
