

The Bahá'í Sense of Human Unity.

Dr Stephen Bigger University College Worcester.

ABSTRACT

This paper is an investigation conducted with members of the Bahá'í Faith community in the UK. The contributor is not a Bahá'í but has researched Bahá'í literature and practice over the past decade and has close links with Bahá'í groups.

It explores social, political and global issues as seen through Bahá'í eyes. The Bahá'í Faith is small but worldwide and internationalist in theology, with central beliefs about nurturing global peace and prosperity through the concept of human unity. The theology of the unity of spiritual revelation gives multi-faith dialogue a high profile in Bahá'í activities.

The data in this paper are based on the responses of Bahá'ís to a qualitative questionnaire.

Methodology.

This study has interviewed 11 British Bahá'ís on how they perceive their contribution to world development, for a conference focusing on issues of Faith, Feeling and Identity, at the University of Surrey Roehampton in July 2003. The data is qualitative. The author is not a Bahá'í nor an adherent of any other religion and raises theological, philosophical and political issues about the data.

The analysis will be based around the following questions:

1. What contributions to you feel Bahá'ís make to the local community?
2. What contributions to you feel Bahá'ís make globally?
3. How do you think schools should promote spiritual development?
4. How important do you regard dialogue with a) other faiths and b) secularists?
5. How do you approach truth claims which are different than yours?
6. How important do you regard the revelation of the scripture?
7. How in practical terms does belief in the unity of humankind affect your thinking and attitudes?
8. How do you see the role of the Bahá'í World Centre?
9. What do you see as the Bahá'ís' distinctive contribution to the world community?

Quotations given below show the number of the interviewee and the number of the question – e.g. 10.3 is interviewee 10 answering question 3.

The Bahá'í Faith

The Bahá'í Faith is small in numbers, world-wide in spread, and internationalist in theology, with central beliefs of the unity of human kind and the importance of developmental agendas which nurture global peace and prosperity through unity. The Bahai community locally, nationally and internationally is typically multi-ethnic and lives out the theology of unity in diversity. The theology of the unity of religion and spiritual revelation gives multi-faith dialogue a high profile in Bahai activities.

The roots of faith are in nineteenth century Shi'ite Islam in Iran (see further Momen 1985). From the beginning and still today, Iranian Bahá'ís have suffered persecution first by the Shah's forces and latterly by the revolutionary Iranian government after 1979 (Nash 1982; Sears 1982). Many have endured harassment and some have died for their faith in a persecution that continues right up to the present.

The name Bahá'í derives from their favoured divine name Baha, 'Glory'. Their main teachings concern the oneness of the human race, world peace, harmony, the end of foreign-ness, and equality (e.g. race and gender). Other world religions and their scriptures are respected, their founders being regarded as 'manifestations of God'. God is viewed as transcendent and unknowable. Manifestations represent God to the world at particular times, expressing God's will and message and serving humanity in exemplary ways. This builds to a doctrine of progressive revelation. The Bahá'í Faith stresses unity in world politics (particularly the critique of nationalism), responsible technology, environmental trusteeship, world communication, global harmony, consultation and democracy.

Literature on the Bahá'í faith tends to be either official (reports, scriptures or devotional texts) from the national Bahá'í Publishing Trust offices, or the Universal House of Justice), academic/historical (especially George Ronald Publishers), or general spiritual (especially Oneworld Publications). The above brief biographical survey gives details of scriptural texts. The Promise of World Peace (Universal House of Justice 1985), and The Prosperity of Humankind (Bahá'í International Community 1995) are contributions to global policy. Bahá'í history has a number of in depth treatments – Balyuzi, Taherzadeh, Shoghi Effendi and the early primary account of the early years by Nadil. Of the more accessible accounts, Hatcher and Martin (1984) is outstanding. Other useful introductions are by Smith 1988, Momen, Esslemont 1923, Schaeffer 1977 and Huddleston 1980.

Most significant figures in the formation of the Bahá'í Faith were Sayyid Ali Muhammad (1819-1850), commonly known as The Bab ('gate'),; and Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri (1817-1892), commonly known as Bahá'ullah, 'the glory of God'. The Bab pointed the way to a coming one, a manifestation of the divine word. Bab was a technical term for the one providing access to the hidden imam of Shi'ism, who became hidden one thousand Islamic years before the Bab declared himself to have a divine mission as the spokesman for the hidden Imam, the Imam Mahdi. His followers became known as Babis. The Bab had written over 5 million words by 1847: most no longer extant. His teachings were compiled into the Bayan, some elements of which still survive in the Bahá'í Faith – pilgrimage, the 19 months of 19 days (in numerology, 19 represents the words wahid, 'unity' and wujud, 'God's absoluteness') and the ending of instant divorce. The Bab began to foresee the coming of a Manifestation for the current age. Opposition to the Bab was as much political as religious, since Babism had a fervour which led to public excitement and unrest. The Bab was executed by firing squad in 1850.

Both Bahá'ullah and his brother Azal (Subh-i Azal) led the Babis after the Bab's execution. Azal's political aspirations for leadership led to some wilderness years at first and devastating political interference throughout the century, which included two attempts at Bahá'ullah's life, and almost permanent imprisonment. Bahá'ullah was recognized as leader of the Babis, who adopted the name Bahá'ís at this time. He spent some time in prison. in the "black pit" in Tehran. He wrote The Hidden Words in 1858 (Bahá'ullah 1932) and Kitab-i Iqan or "Book of Certitude" in 1862. Between these came a deeply spiritual work, The Seven Valleys (Bahá'ullah 1992a) which owes much to the Sufi Attar's The Conference of the Birds ensuring that the mystical path is theocentric and channelled through God's messengers, the Manifestations.

In 1863 before Bahá'ullah left Baghdad for exile in Constantinople (1863-8) he declared himself privately to his followers, in the Garden of Ridvan, to have spiritual authority: many accepted him to be the expected Manifestation and became known as Bahá'ís rather than Babis. Azal refused to accept Bahá'ullah's declaration and declared himself to be the Coming One, but had very little support in the Babi community. Nevertheless, he continued to cause trouble.

From 1868 Bahá'ullah was exiled in prison in Akka, Palestine, eventually commuted to house arrest in his house called Bahji. He lived and continued teaching there until his death in 1892. He wrote many letters, books and devotional writings. Letters to foreign rulers advertised the Bahá'í message and demanded ethical government. Predictions of the fall of the Ottomans, the defeat of France and the first world war all added to his status when they came true. He stood for just constitutional rule, with rulers protecting and educating their people, eliminating poverty and working to international reconciliation with arms reductions, collective security, a single language and a world tribunal which would gradually work for the unification of an integrated world homeland without national tensions (the Most Great Peace'). He produced a book of guidance, the Kitab-i-Aqdas in 1873 which set out Bahá'í devotions, practices, ethics and values stressing propriety in conduct and the moral life, based on conscience rather than enforcement. Prohibitions included backbiting, disharmony, enslavement, gambling, intoxicants and ascetic religious practices - as well as criminal activities. Music was accepted as being 'the ladder for the soul'. Bahá'ís should not be exclusive but should associate with other faiths in friendship (Smith, 1996, 71-3; Bahá'ullah 1992b and see further Balyuzi H.M 1980; Taherzadeh 1974; Esslemont, 1923).

His son Abbas Effendi (1844-1921) was groomed to succeed, and took the humble title Abdu'l-Baha, 'servant of the Glory'. Most of his writings (chiefly letters and speeches) date after 1892 and selections are available ('Abdu'l-Baha 1978). His life and work (Balyuzi H.M. 1987) falls into three phases. From 1892 - 1908, imprisoned in Akka he was interpreter of Bahá'ullah and "The Centre of the Covenant of Bahá'ullah", seeking unity, creating locally elected Bahá'í councils and outlining the system of election to the Universal House of Justice. At a very early stage he declared his grandson Shoghi Effendi to be his ultimate successor, The Guardian of the Faith. After the Young Turk revolution in 1908, political prisoners were freed. Abdu'l-Baha moved to Haifa, buried the Bab and built a mausoleum on Mount Carmel and traveled around the world between 1910 and 1913, including Europe, America and Canada, meeting world leaders and local Bahá'í communities. The final stage, from 1913-1921 saw him in poor health, helping the poor and hungry, helping in European restructuring but warning of instability and tensions to come. His writings are significant to Bahá'ís: 27,000 letters survive, and many talks, including those on his world mission.

Shoghi Effendi was educated in Oxford University (Balliol) from 1920. In his grandfather's will he was named 'Guardian of the Cause of God', the 'Centre of the Cause', and the 'Sign of God'. He was less patriarchal and devoted himself to writings: many of the English translations of Bahá'í scriptures are his work. He quickly set up the system of elected local spiritual assemblies and encouraged the development of national spiritual assemblies also. His emphasis on organization had beneficial effects, with a Global Crusade (from 1953) which helped to create a rapid geographical expansion. He established the Bahá'í World Centre in Akka/Haifa: the land around Bahá'ullah's house, Bahji, was developed into gardens; in Haifa, around the Bab's mausoleum. the International Archives building was completed in 1957. After Shoghi Effendi's death, no successor had been named and arrangements were made to establish the International House of Justice in 1963. The development of the World Centre has continued with a constitution based on elections and consultation. By 2002 there were 182 national spiritual assemblies on five continents.

Spiritual Imperative and Religious Contribution

The Bahá'í Faith sets out in its core beliefs to recognise all major religions of the world as authentic. This links with a core doctrine of the 'oneness of religion' which comes with a necessary condemnation of the tendencies to disunity brought about by exclusive attitudes to faith. This sets up a tension between the belief that Bahá'ullah is the current divine manifestation and the recognition of previous 'Manifestations' (Jesus, Muhammad, Buddha and so on). Dialogue must be one sided, if Bahá'ís doctrinally recognise the authenticity of other founders, but these do not in turn recognise Bahá'ullah or for that matter any other religious founder. For Bahá'ís, a steady stream of 'progressive' divine revelation leads to the present: the world's ignorance of the Bahá'í message must by definition deprive the earth of current and relevant divine guidance, leaving most to try to cope with out of date messages for other eras and different value systems and world problems – that is with inappropriate tools. In the Bahá'í identify therefore, concepts such as mentors, world welfare, custodianship, and pioneer are highly significant. Bahá'ís see themselves with a world-transforming mission. However, the Bahá'í Faith is not a proselyte faith since Bahá'ullah warned against hard-nosed evangelism.

A Bahá'í is someone who accepts the authority of Bahá'ullah as God's latest 'Manifestation', who revealed God's guidance for the current industrial and technological age. There should be a reasoned approach at all times: reason is presented as God's gift to humanity.

"Bahá'ís accept that reason must be applied to all the phenomena of existence, including those which are spiritual, and the instrument to be used in this effort is the scientific method. 'Abdu'l-Bahá ... asserted that: "Any religion that contradicts science or that is opposed to it is only ignorance – for ignorance is the opposite of knowledge.". To an unusual degree, therefore, one who studies the Bahá'í Faith finds the subject laid open to examination. The mysteries one encounters, like those of the physical universe, reflect no more than the recognized limitations of human knowledge." (Hatcher and Martin 1984 xvi).

Whilst recognising the authenticity of other religious leaders and traditions, these are not the prime focus of worship since they have been superseded. Although historically deriving from a Judaeo-Christian-Islamic background with an emphasis on inward and spiritual reflection rather than external ritual, Bahá'ís saw themselves (and were seen by opponents) from the early days as not constrained by Islam but a new religion based on a new revelation. A great effort goes into interfaith dialogue and collaboration: in a sense most interfaith dialogue is a conversation between closed minds (few move from one faith to another as a result of the conversation) but dialogue can notwithstanding be enriching. The Bahá'í view is that religion is one, interconnected, and that all world religions stem from divine guidance to humanity. Other religions must therefore be respected. However, the concept of progressive revelation holds that religions are superseded by new guidance for different ages, which essentially ranks religions, some being more superseded than others. A prime motive for interfaith dialogue is therefore as much persuasion as learning.

The Bahá'í Faith has local, regional and national bodies all under the auspices of the international body. These circles coexist and interact constantly. In the UK, there are local groups with a regional organisation and national assemblies. There is a major Bahá'í House of Worship on each continent (at Wilmette, Illinois, Kampala, Sydney, Frankfurt, Panama City, Apia (Western Samoa) and New Delhi. The Bahá'í World Centre and Universal House of Justice is in Haifa, Israel.

The interviewees were asked about the social and political implications of their faith. One responded that spirituality affects their daily life and work:

Bahá'ís help provide meaning and spiritual content to everyday activities and happenings and can help infuse their workplaces and local communities with a sense of purpose and worth (5.1).

She emphasised 'faith in action' involving the environment, education and community development, empowering people to help themselves.

"In general, Bahá'ís are socially active people, have a heightened awareness of social issues and are concerned with the welfare of others, with the functioning of their communities and with effecting positive change for the benefit of all. As a result, many Bahá'ís are inspired to involve themselves with various community-based initiatives and activities. My own experience is that you will find a disproportionate number of Bahá'ís on voluntary bodies e.g. magistrates, women's refuges, equality fora, etc. Bahá'ís like myself who attend UN summits e.g. Social and Economic Development Summit in Copenhagen 1995, 4th Conference on Women in Beijing 1995, Habitat II in Istanbul 1996, Social Development in Johannesburg 2002, etc.) also bring back to their local communities information and insights which then inform local action." (5.1)

For another, this involvement helps to shape society:

Bahá'ís try to be 'good citizens' and are more conscious than most of environmental issues. They tend to be outgoing so, for instance, many of my local community are involved in local groups (6.1).

Another argued that Bahá'ís bring distinctive values into situations, seeking consensus and trying to win over hearts and minds:

“Bahá'ís are often excellent facilitators and peacemakers, and in most fora can smooth things over. Here in West Oxfordshire Bahá'ís do many things as individuals which people don't connect with their Faith - a project to clear a Mozambique Minefield with the UNA, a big project in Honduras for Agriculture and rural development, the UK end of which is run from Duckington, the V-P of the UNA's Southern Region, the President of the Oxfordshire Family History Assn, the organiser of the Chipping Norton Music Festival, members of the North Oxon Meditation Group, a guide at Kelmscott, also lots of friendship links with church people and councilors, someone who works in the WCRP, several in education” (1.1).

This may involve an individual being a member of a pressure group, or a group putting on a library display of artistic event. Devotional events such as festivals and feasts are used to invite non-Bahá'ís.

Bahá'ís are principled people who conduct their daily lives and the life of their community in accordance with a set of values that reflect the spiritual nature of the human being and who are committed to ideals which are a matter of deep spiritual conviction. Because Bahá'ís identify the main ill of humanity as its disunity, the efforts of individual Bahá'ís and their communities are almost always directed towards initiatives that will promote a consciousness of the oneness of humanity and will provide practical ways to demonstrate and achieve this. (5.1)

This provides “a spiritual framework for social action” which is “concerned with evoking change in public policy”. Bahá'ís often assist a community “to raise its sense of the important issues of the day” eliciting change from the grassroots, welling up “from the hearts of individuals” (5.1) Bahá'ís stand for local involvement, consultation and democracy. The Bahai vision is one of empowerment, and we find educational, social and cultural involvement. Bahá'ís might seek “to overcome fragmentation in society” (6.1). This fragmentation might apply to any group who are disadvantaged. Work to support disenfranchised or disadvantaged women has not disappeared from the agenda in the past two centuries; also action against poverty, discrimination and racism. In providing a model for developing and expressing unity, the Bahá'í community supports the developing understanding of those worshipping within it:

“The Bahá'í community does have an internal momentum and substance however, and so acts principally as a resource for those few who actively wish to explore the Bahá'í faith in practice.” (2.1)

The community is a collection of individuals who each make a difference, a social structure within which people grow in an unregimented way. Respondents were worried that the local Bahá'í community was in itself not doing much, whilst also saying that individuals within that community were doing a great deal.

Global influence

They were asked about international and global aspects of their faith.

The Bahá'í faith has given us the concept of a world community. It was a central theme of Bahá'ullah's message long before the term 'Global Village' was coined. The distinctive contribution is the realisation that we are part of a global community. (1.2)

From the earliest days, the Bahá'í Faith have sought to influence world policy through letters to world leaders. This was no easy route and leaders spent much of their time oppressed and imprisoned. They have supported efforts to bring about world harmony as a precursor to world unity.

Since the League of Nations was started Bahá'ís both internationally and nationally have worked with the UNO and the League, so carrying forward international law. Bahá'ís are well represented among international civil servants and international lawyers, and indeed weapons inspectors. (1.2)

This has earned respect:

In addition, in global organisations like the United Nations, there is often a respect for Bahá'í ideals and Bahá'í representation is often relatively high. (2.2)

Globally, they play a significant part in feeding ideas and ideals into leaders of thought in the fields of international discussion and humanitarian agencies. (6.2)

The Bahá'í Faith seeks to be involved with global policy formation at the highest levels:

In addition, the Bahá'í International Community (the agency that interfaces with international institutions such as the UN), as an NGO, has a high profile at the international level and is involved at UN Summits and Commissions. It is influential in shaping thought in such areas as the environment, social and economic development and the status of women. (5.2)

This was linked to personal qualities that the Bahá'í Faith promote:

Their behaviour (honest, moderate, sober, chaste) and attitudes (positive, loving, compassionate, encouraging) raise the general spiritual atmosphere and the ethos of the communities they live in. ... also work to promote oneness via UN, tolerance and understanding between faiths.

Others work on developmental projects:

Globally, the contribution is somewhat greater. There are many Bahá'ís who work in the third world, doing lots of very good socio-economic developmental work which substantially benefits local and even some national communities, often under the aegis of a Bahá'í inspired project. (2.2)

Bahá'ís feel that the Bahá'í agenda is changing the world.

The Bahá'í Faith has had an impact on the language used to refer to a global society, a language that was previously unthinkable. I believe that we have had a very positive impact on environmental issues through Agenda 21, in human rights, on matters of civil society generally with our contributions at the UN. (11.2)

Today Bahá'ís find supportive audiences, but this has not always been so over the past two centuries: this is not a case of jumping on a modern bandwagon but setting out an agenda amid nineteenth century imperial capitalism. There is a difference too between the concepts of global exploitation (exploitation of global markets) and the unity of humankind: the world is divided by nationhood, politics and religion. The journey from here to world unity will be a difficult one.

Alternative society

The Bahá'í Faith "gives a vision of the way the world could be – peaceful, just, prosperous, unified – and practical steps for achieving this" (9.9). Bahá'ís have aspirations for world society which they model in their own communities.

"Because the Bahá'í community is engaged in creating an alternative model of social relationships. They offer their own community as a model of peaceful co-existence among diverse peoples, of unity in diversity, and demonstrate how to use the Bahá'í concept of consultation to make decisions." (5.1)

The Bahá'í Faith wishes to provide a model for an alternative society, a transformed vision of arranging social relations and affairs.

The Bahá'ís are involved in building an alternative society in which barriers of race, class, gender, ageism and other prejudices are removed. Within many local Bahá'í communities there is a good mix. In overcome barriers within their own community they make a good model for the rest of the world. (7.2)

Building community as a model to others is very important. Then there's the work at the United Nations, with NGOs, in social and Economic development, education, healthcare etc. All in all we are creating a community which does not recognise barriers of race, creed, class or religion and that is a model that others can study and emulate. (8.2)

In an age when many people's social and political beliefs are motivated by a reaction to what they oppose (i.e. anti-globalism), the Bahá'ís seek to build another model of an alternative kind of world they believe is possible, and the world-wide community exists as an experiment in global living for others to examine. (9.2)

The Bahá'í Faith have been accused of world imperialism, running an American style police state from Haifa – so it is important to reflect on the meaning of the above examples. The Bahá'í community runs itself by consultation, democracy and open management. There is no room for personal ambitions since everything is channelled to communal good. The vision for world politics is the same – no nations, with the whole human race regarding itself as one community managed and policed by open and transparent democratic decision-making where decisions are for the public good and not for sectional benefits. This would need a base, a physical centre, preferably one which is clearly not tied into vested interests. A judicial process based on law and precedent would need to be created as former precedents are underpinned with different judicial assumptions. They call this the International House of Justice. Bodies such as the United Nations are tentative steps in this direction.

Interviewees were asked how important they regarded dialogue with other faiths and with secularists. They all found dialogue with other religions to be vitally important with a number of scenarios presented. The opposite of dialogue is non-communication:

Of course we are told in the Bahá'í writings that we must consort with people of all faiths in fellowship and friendship and having first hand experience of this I can clearly see the benefits. Likewise I can see some of the troubles when we don't talk together. 11.4

The talk may be about religious belief in general:

Very important, but if they don't want to talk beliefs then just to relate to each other as believers is important. 1.4

Only constructive dialogue is helpful

This is of great importance. However, it is very important to have a real dialogue, not a slanging match, which merely makes things worse. Often, real dialogue is not possible, and then it is better to say nothing. So, very important but must be conducted with the greatest of care and sensitivity in order to achieve something constructive. 2.4

Dialogue is seen to promote tolerance

In a world where it is very easy for extremists to try to use religion as a means of separating people it is important for their to be dialogue so that the different viewpoints are regarded as equally valid. 7.4

Dialogue with all people of goodwill will aid the evolution of a human culture that promotes tolerance for otherness and upholds the right of peaceful co-existence. Whilst contact with forces in the secular world is eminently desirable and potentially fruitful, opening or strengthening channels of communication to other faiths is an imperative necessity in a world where rigid and fundamentalist religious doctrines are promoting ideas of exclusiveness and division, often through violence. 9.4

Important in that it helps understanding and social cohesion, but only if all parties are willing to let go of their claims to exclusive access to the truth. 8.4

How to dialogue sensitively and not adversarially needs to be taught and guided and is not easy. To the committed, 'truth' may not be seen as relative. Dialogue between those religiously committed is unlikely to stimulate a change of belief system, but have a main function in developing mutual understanding. One interviewee expressed this point in terms of 'religious unity':

Dialogue with members of all religions should be encouraged as it is the gateway to achieving understanding of each others' beliefs, and helps to identify the common themes in all religions, which in turn will lead to greater prospects of religious unity. 10.4

Dialogue with people of other faiths is critically important. Bahá'ís are possibly too careful not to upset the followers of other religions, as they are so aware that approaches between people of different traditions are often so tentative at this stage. 6.4

Sometimes dialogue is done institutionally in formal contexts:

I work for an interfaith organisation so think this dialogue is critical. 3.4

Very. I am myself a member of the Bedford Council of Faiths and a Trustee of the Multi-Faith Centre at the University of Derby, both of which aim to foster dialogue and understand among religions. I am also involved with a number of other organizations, e.g. equality implementation team for the magistrates, equal forum for the County Council, UNIFEM and Soroptimists, which are like-minded organisations promoting principles similar to those of the Bahá'í Faith. 5.4

About secularists, six felt that constructive dialogue is helpful:

We can learn from anyone, and them from us, moreover we all share a common humanity. More relevantly, we are all en route to and from these positions. 1.4

For one, it is "Essential if any of these values are to be shared" (8.4). Another noted "few opportunities" (6.4). Another was concerned to preserve and protect the religious view of life:

While I also support the right not to believe, I am concerned about the trend among secularists to 'shut out' the religious view altogether, which is not fair. (3.4)

Attitudes to other truth claims.

We asked How do you approach truth claims which are different than yours? This is a challenging question at the best of times.

I used to get very tense and feel I had to prove myself and my beliefs, now I take an interest in hearing what others have to say and am happy to answer any question they have about the Bahá'í Faith, but I am never happy to get into a tit-for-tat debate. (11.5)

Debate was seen generally as a serious quest for understanding rather than cheap points scoring. A common insistence is that faith should be logical:

I am sceptical about any claims that ... ask me to believe six impossible things before breakfast or ask me to accept as fact events that do not accord with science. (5.5)

Revelation also was a source of confidence. The concept of progressive revelation allows the belief that all religions are rooted in God's message. One respondent said he viewed other truth claims:

With an open mind and an understanding that this will be another way in which God has presented his message. (10.5)

For another,

Ultimately, when approaching people of other traditions it is necessary to combine wisdom and humility with candour. (9.5)

On the one hand, once we have made up our minds, it is hard to change them again:

I try to have an open mind but must admit my ideas are very much coloured by what I believe as a Bahá'í. (5.5)

On the other hand, some argued that other traditions may be equally valid as routes to God:

There are many paths to God. The Bahá'ís would not claim to be the only way. The Bahá'í way is to emphasise the similarities rather than the differences. (7.5)

I appreciate that truth is not exclusive or final and that everyone has different perceptions of what is true. I would not force my version of the truth on others or reject theirs. (8.5)

They all are speaking the truth, yet their respective truths collide. Truth, and religious truth, is relative. (9.5)

Religious Inter-faith Dialogue.

We have seen that a high importance is placed on dialogue: this is affirmed by all interviewees. Theologically the concept of progressive revelation helps, in that all monotheistic religions are defined inclusively as being within the same family. However, we have seen that this is theologically not mutual: a 'current' Manifestation of God with an updated divine revelation is a threat to those (Muslims and Christians) who affirm that their earlier revelation is definitive. Just as 'the hidden Christ within Hinduism' could be accused of cultural imperialism, so the unity of religion could assume the ambition that everyone become Bahá'ís. The line between inclusivity and exclusivity is a fine one.

An important concept to come out is that of reconciliation:

To make religions and cultures reconcile with each other without sinking into a colourless coca cola society.

Revelation is seen by Bahá'ís to be not exclusive but across history a regular feature of the human-divine interface:

I believe God is like a radio station broadcasting at all times to all places. Messengers of God are the receivers who bring the signal down to earth. The scriptures are the channels of this power. That applies to those books which we claim to be the 'Word of God' and those which are traditional scriptures of other faiths. (8.6)

Therefore, monotheistic religions have a common root:

Scripture then is a record of God's will for humanity for the age. As a Bahá'í I accept the concept that the essential heart of all religion is the same; to love and honour God, to put the spiritual self ahead of the material self, to obey God's will and to serve and love others. God's message within scripture evolves throughout the ages as humanity grows to maturity and therefore I regard all monotheistic scripture as one developing, evolving truth, with each tradition possessing equal validity in the wider sweep of history, but also a priority message in the age in which it was revealed. (9.6)

Hinduism is included within Bahá'í writings on the view that it is at its heart monotheistic. The incarnational aspect of Hinduism is chosen as the focus, with Krishna, incarnation of Vishnu, being the Manifestation recognized as genuine. Hinduism is in reality far more complex.

7. This is a vision of a world without disagreements and divisions, without different, rival and hostile constructions of 'the truth'. It is however a spiritual rather than a secular vision in which belief in God is central. One construction of theological truth is assumed, the others become outdated revelations, as it were 'old testaments'. Bahá'ullah discouraged aggressive conversions; but attitudes towards other theological and philosophical constructions is important.

The greatest benefit to me and effect on my life of the belief in the unity of humankind is staggering possibilities that are open me from accepting this idea. The narrow doctrines of racial, religious or national tribalism that continue to divide many sections of humanity shut people out from the richness and potential that accrues from living as members of a true global society. In practical terms I have been received as an equal by fellow Bahá'ís in many lands far from my home, and I feel enriched through my friendships with people from all manner of backgrounds.

This belief is also a responsibility because it challenges a Bahá'í to view all humanity equally, and there is no doubt that we all retain social and cultural programming from an early age that can militate against such a philosophy. This belief strongly hones my sense of social justice in view of such global issues as continuing poverty in huge swathes of Africa and Asia and the brutal denial of fundamental rights to so many of my fellow beings. (11.7)

The concept of unity helped one respondent in daily personal decisions and behaviour:
It helps me to spot racial and ethnic and religious prejudices. It stops me being cliquish or divisive towards others. In world affairs it helps me to see other peoples' points of view. (4.7)

Others said:

Belief in the unity of humankind means that I must curb any impatience, irritation with others, anger, jealousy and prejudice. It shapes my assessment of other groups of people and my adoption of "political" goals. (6.7)

I try to see all people as members of the human race and I try not to be misled by my first impression. (7.7)

It means I do not see colour. That I appreciate diversity. That I feel free to travel anywhere. That I am open to conversations with anyone about anything. (8.7)

Having not become a Bahá'í from being something (or nothing) else it is difficult to know how it is affected as all I can remember is this world view. However I know that I consciously view the world with the firm belief in attaining and lasting unity between all peoples and that when I see disunity I feel strong in the knowledge that I am part of something that tries to unite and reconcile. (11.7)

Unity

All respondents saw the concept of unity as the Bahá'ís most distinctive contribution.

The distinctive contribution of the Bahá'í Faith is the exaltation of unity to the status of overarching principle. (6.9)

Unity, a beacon of hope for the future and a good example of how things may work constructively in practice even now. A blueprint for reconciling the multifarious differences of view in the world. (2.9)

'Blueprint' is used of the process and not of the solution: it is the idea of unity that fuels discussion, debate and decision making all are seeking commonly acceptable solutions. This is no easy task. A majority vote can disenfranchise and disempower almost half of the voters. Consensus assumes that everyone can sign up and therefore the proposition may need to be watered down, perhaps even unacceptably. The strident voices may assume greater dominance than their views justify. The worst scenario is that no one decides anything.

Empowerment of people by involvement in decision making is one of the common Bahá'í strategies:

They also have a useful tool in 'Bahá'í consultation'. Everyone's voice is equally valid and all should have their say. (7.9)

This has implications for the spread of democracy:

One fundamental contribution the Bahá'í faith has made to world society has been to establish a real global democracy. While other idealists dream of such a thing, the Bahá'ís have made it a reality, representing 6 million souls from the widest array of humanity that is conceivable. (9.9)

Unity needs to be an example for the whole world system:

As the Bahá'ís struggle to create unity within their own community they can be used as a model for the rest of the world. (7.9)

I think the Bahá'í Faith is one of those small, quiet organisations which has been growing steadily and widely in obscurity but if people choose to open their eyes, they will see it everywhere having a profound effect on society. The distinctive contribution it can make is its concept of oneness which genuinely operates in the community and is an example to the whole world. (8.9)

Social, cultural and religious unity are interlinked:

The most important contributions that the Bahá'ís will make to their fellow human beings will simply be the recognition of three core ideas of unity; the oneness of humanity, the oneness of religion, the oneness of God. The healing effect of these beliefs as they grow in stature and permeate people's thinking around the world will ultimately do far more good than the thousands of development projects and human rights campaigns facilitated by Bahá'ís. (9.9)

Spiritual education in schools

This will receive separate discussion but the main points to emerge were:

- It's not the job of schools to destroy people's faiths, but to help people see that without spirituality we cannot live. (1.3)
- Worship which connects with the children and varies between faiths (3) – not a hotch potch but which gives real understanding of worship.
- The practical real-life aspects of spiritual development. (2.3) – how spirituality affects and influences daily life.
- Examples which are focused around the actual experiences (and predictable future experiences) of the children in the class. (2.3)
- I think schools should teach moral values -- as commonly taught by all world religions. (3.3)
- We could also teaching religion as religion rather than as 'things'. (5.3). RE tends to be about festivals, foods and rituals – but not on the essence of religion itself.
- Schools should promote spiritual development... spiritual development should be something which frees us as individuals (6.3)
- Tranquillity Zones (5.3) – encouragement of meditation and quiet reflection.
- Drawing out and developing virtues (7.3) – it is about what kind of people we are and want to be.
- Respect for faiths (7.3) – and in general better and more balanced information about all religions (10.3)
- Spiritual education is not the same as religious education. Spiritual education is holistic, covering all school processes: 'Through emphasising morals, ethics, values, virtues, citizenship, an appreciation of beauty, nature, the arts and music, prayer.' (8.3)
- Community service should be encouraged, as in the IB (9.3)
- More emphasis needs to be made on the concept that we are spiritual beings in a material world. (10.3)
- A marrying up of personal and spiritual development and citizenship – pupils need to see that these things are connected.
