UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

Leslie Sult, Librarian

Sult, L. (2013). Developing and sharing an open source software tool that supports online interactive learning. E-Learning in Libraries: Best Practices, 63.

At first blush, the side-by-side tutorial was the ideal candidate for this new tool. It was already an integral part of many courses offered by the university and was beginning to be used by many instructors as the primary, if not exclusive, means of providing library research instruction. The problem, however, continued to be the amount of time it took librarians and programming staff to prepare and maintain each tutorial. Indeed, one internal estimate logged the development, programming, editing, and grading time for 200 students at approximately 120 hours per new tutorial. Once created, the time required to maintain and update the tutorial was found to be about 40 total hours of librarian and programming staff time. There was also the matter of providing individual student feedback, the time for which could never be accurately measured since it depended entirely on the skill level of the students involved and the complexity of the topic. For the side-by-side tutorials to succeed at providing meaningful scaled instruction on a wider basis, a way had to be devised to create and maintain them much more quickly and with far less effort.
