THE PROBLEM AND DEFINITION OF TERMS USED

The first grade teacher in a self-contained classroom attempts to provide a well-rounded program of education. Music is a very important part of this program. In order to have an excellent music program, the teacher needs to have a good basic knowledge and understanding of music, a good basic knowledge and understanding of children, and a ready reference to what is available in the area of music for use at the first grade level.

Numerous texts in music are available. Each public school generally provides one or several of these texts. However, the teacher needs to be aware of all the suggested song and music literature that is available at the present time in order to provide an excellent program in music.

I. THE PROBLEM

Statement of the problem. It is the purpose of this study to provide an annotated bibliography of music literature with suggested correlation for grade one.

Importance of the study. The first grade teacher needs to have song and music literature available to meet the existing needs of children. In order to do this, the teacher has to know what is available in texts in all areas of learning. This bibliography is an attempt to provide the teacher with information concerning the material available in first grade music texts.

II. DEFINITION OF TERMS USED

Certain terminology, although in common use in music education, may be strange to the layman and need definition.

In this study, "bibliography" refers to two things:

1. A listing of all the music literature for use in first grade.
2. A listing of fourteen first grade music texts and books of importance to the area of music education.

Song literature refers to songs for singing and rhythmic activities and to piano pieces for listening and rhythmic activities.

Annotated means a brief comment, including such things as composer, type of music, what the song is about, suggested accompaniment, mood, suggested rhythmic activities, length, rhythm, range, and national origin.

Correlative means combining music with all other subject areas found in the curriculum.

The abbreviations for publishers of the music books referred to here need the following clarification:

Ginn.	Ginn and Company, Chicago, Illinois
A.B.C.	American Book Company, Chicago, Illinois
S.B.C.	Silver Burdett Company, San Francisco, California
F.P.C.	Follett Publishing Company, Chicago, Illinois
P.H.	Prentice-Hall, Incorporated, Englewood Cliffs,

New Jersey

C.C.B.	C. C. Birchard and Company, United States
N.A.K.M.C.	Neil A. Kjos Music Company, Chicago, Illinois
A. and B.	Allyn and Bacon, Incorporated, Belmont, California
S.-B.	Summy-Birchard Company, Evanston, Illinois
P.P.	piano piece

III. LIMITATIONS OF THE STUDY

This annotated bibliography of music literature is an objective listing of available music literature found in music texts to help teachers correlate music with other subject areas for enrichment. It does not eliminate the need for teaching music as such. It merely emphasizes the need for music throughout the daily lives of children.

The present bibliography does not attempt to differentiate good music literature from poorly written or trite literature. All music literature selected for first grade texts was included. The evaluation and selection of good music literature has been left to each individual teacher. The previously stated criteria of song selection, by authorities in the field of music education, may be of assistance at this point.

Finally, this bibliography is not a teacher's guide for the purpose of telling teachers how to teach music. It was designed to help the teacher correlate music with other subject areas for enrichment, keeping in mind the need to evaluate the individual merit of each piece of music.

CHAPTER II

REVIEW OF RELATED LITERATURE

To understand what was available in song and music literature in music texts, the writer has reviewed the music literature that is specifically for first grade. The writer has also reviewed books that were of importance to the area of music education. For purposes of efficient summarization, the literature will be reviewed in this chapter under the following headings: The Correlative Approach; Criteria of Song Selection; and Singing with Children.

I. THE CORRELATIVE APPROACH

Nye and Nye described the use of music in other areas of the curriculum in this way:

A beautiful song that possesses emotional values and that describes experiences meaningful to children has universal appeal. These aesthetic, emotional, and cultural qualities point toward this song's possible use to add interest, meaning, and enjoyment to other areas of the curriculum. It is also true that the subject matter of other areas can make music activities more interesting, meaningful, and enjoyable (12:325).

Timmerman described the formal and informal experiences in music:

Singing experiences in the elementary school should include informal music, both inside and outside the group. This music may be integrated with social studies, science and language arts, or it may be purely recreational and for release from tension. Aside from the informal experiences, there should also be a special time set aside for music. This should be a short concentrated period with music as the main point of emphasis (17:77).

Ellison stated the following:

Music provides a splendid tool to be utilized during the entire school day, aiding program development in many ways (4:20).

McMillan described music as being a part of children's daily living. She wrote:

A third special opportunity which we have in the elementary school is to make music a part of children's everyday living. It is perfectly natural for a child to want to sing about the things that he is thinking and feeling (10:5).

Pitts and others indicated the need for music throughout the whole school program in this statement:

Children's spontaneous responses to song make it unfortunate when all singing is put aside until that time in the school day which is reserved especially for music.

Young children sing about the pictures they paint, the pets they feed and care for, the stories they hear, the sun that shines and the rain that falls, and they just sing - at odd times, special times, and all times (14:X).

McConathy and others also described the importance of music in other areas of the curriculum but cautioned the use of music as a mere tool. They stated:

Although music must of itself be regarded as a major subject, it also serves as a powerful integrator to effect inter-relationships and to illuminate the entire educational program for boys and girls. However, even with the youngest children, music must never become merely a tool with which to coordinate and enhance other subjects in the curriculum. Music makes its own distinctive contribution (9:V).

Armitage and others described the plan and organization of their book as follows:

The plan of this book is based on the idea that music can and should strengthen the general educational aims in the primary grades. In later years of the child's life music may be subdivided into separated aspects, but in his early school years not only are its various phases grouped by the child under the single idea of music, but all of its various manifestations are closely related to the rest of the child's life.

Our musical material is presented in units of study, the unifying idea of each being a topic which is commonly found in first grade courses of study (1: introduction).

II. CRITERIA OF SONG SELECTION

The criteria of song selection is of major importance. Swanson listed six criteria for the selection of a good song. She stated the following:

A good song is essentially a simple song that the child may sing with pleasure outside the classroom. Each song must stand on its own merits, but the following characteristics may be important in different songs:

1. The melody is easily remembered and interesting enough to sing without the words.
2. The song prompts a definite rhythmic response.
3. The text fits the rhythmic scheme and melody line.
4. The message and feeling of the text is well mated with the message and feeling of the music.
5. The text may be nonsensical, repetitious, tender, or heroic, but it is not "preachy" or written to educate.

6. The melody is in a comfortable singing range for the average child's voice (16:38)

Ellison described the type of songs that children enjoy. He wrote:

In short, the range of types of songs that children love stretches as broadly as the range of types of songs that adults love. Children have a kind of natural good taste. They respond to genuineness in a song. They seem to recognize the aesthetic message a composer projects and to know instinctively if he wrote it as a result of a sincere need and desire to communicate through music. Children seem to sense very quickly when a song has been written down to them, when a song writer writes a song that is childish and not childlike, when a hack presents a potboiler, when a specialist puts together a supposed song which is intended primarily to teach note reading.

Our objective in selecting a song will be to find one that, in our best judgement, the children in a particular class under consideration will like and enjoy singing (4:61).

Beattie and others stated the need for variety of mood in music.

They wrote:

Children should be given the opportunity for musical expression in various moods, just as they have variety of mood in reading experiences. Too often it has been thought that children respond only to gay and rollicking tunes and that they are too immature to express themselves in the more thoughtful and quiet moods.

In this highly complex life in which he lives, the child should often be given lovely, expressive melodies to quiet and soothe him. His first introduction to music was through the lullabies sung to him by his mother, and he will enjoy such songs throughout his life. Every music lesson should contain songs which stimulate and others which quiet him (2:1).

Berg and others stated the criteria which should be applied to songs in determining whether they are suitable for six- and seven-year-olds. They stated:

The words in the verses should be familiar to the child, or easily explainable in terms of his own speaking vocabulary....

The rhythm and melody of the song should match as nearly as possible the natural rhythmic flow of the words and the characteristic movements suggested by them....

Everything about a song should establish and express the mood of the text (3:172).

McConathy defined a song and the factors governing the choice of song materials in the following way:

A song is a poem enhanced by music. If the poem is not made more vivid and beautiful by the musical setting, it would be better to read the text without the music. ... Other factors governing the choice of song materials are:

1. Areas of child interest and social relationships of first graders
2. Readiness for singing
  - a. Vocal ability
  - b. Attention span
  - c. Suitability and simplicity of texts
3. Development of pleasure in singing
4. Development of musical taste (9:VII)

Pitts described the following key points:

1. That elements of familiarity abound in both music and text.
2. That range is not too wide. For inexperienced singers, find songs in which the range does not extend beyond five tones.
3. That both verbal and musical ideas are presented briefly in terms which children can understand.

4. That rhythmic flow has lift and lilt. This is found usually in simple songs with lightly moving repetitive tonal-rhythmic patterns in which the primary beat is strongly felt.
5. That music stands on its own feet. Child interest in subject content, correlative values, even in poetic texts, is secondary. Even in childhood a song lives or dies by the integrity of its musical appeal.
6. That close correlation occurs between the word sounds and word rhythms and the tonal rhythm of the musical setting of a text.
7. That melodic content can be grasped as a complete musical idea (14:IX-X).

III. SINGING WITH CHILDREN

In considering certain aspects of children's voices, Timmerman described desirable tone quality as follows:

Good tone quality is clear, unforced, resonant, free from breathiness, and capable of being sustained with little effort. It is seldom hushed, but never raucous. It is the result of interpretation of the mood and meaning of the song (17:79).

The same author, later in the same book, outlined the range of the child voice:

The range of the voice of the average young child is from Middle C to C, D, or E above. Most nursery school children cannot be expected to have a range that wide (17:80).

Nye and Nye described the child voice in the following way:

The child voice is often described as light in quality as well as in volume. It is also an extremely flexible mechanism, as illustrated by the strident cries of the playground. The teacher, then, is confronted by a voice that is capable of expressing many moods in song (12:169).

These authors offered the following suggestions for good singing with children:

1. To make a generally pleasing sound (simple, natural, and clear).
2. To sing in a manner that avoids strain and tenseness.
3. To take breaths where one does when speaking the words (usually as the punctuation indicates); do not interrupt the phrase by breathing in unnatural places.
4. To enunciate clearly, but pronounce r's as Southerners do ah(r) , and sound final consonants distinctly and in unison (12:169-170).

A wide range of desirable vocal conditions were described by Pitts in considering the child voice:

The child voice, as it is heard in the singing of healthy, happy, and hearty children, covers a wide range of variable qualities.

It cannot be said of all children, nor of one child at all times, that the natural child voice is high and light, or thin and delicate, soft and sweet, or of any other uniform or predetermined quality. Too much depends upon when and where the child uses his voice and what the purposes of his singing happen to be.

Children often are found to have one voice which they reserve for the formal music lesson, and many other voices to use at will in their own self-initiated expressive activities.

If this is assumed to be the case, it is not possible to aim for any one accepted ideal of the "true child voice" which all children must measure up to regardless of human variability (14:VI).

Wolfe and others described the child's singing voice in the following way:

Children's singing should be light and buoyant, not restrained and whispered, but easy and natural in quality. The pitch level of each song has been carefully considered by the authors of Music Round the Clock to insure a comfortable range for group singing. A slight change downward or upward would not be harmful to children's voices, but constant singing in lower keys tends to develop a coarse chesty quality of tone which is undesirable for both singing and speaking (19:VI).

Beattie clearly defined the child's voice quality in the following statement:

Children at this age have two vocal registers. One is the chest voice, characterized by a harsh, reedy, unpleasant sound. The other is the head voice, characterized by a light, thin, unforced flutelike quality. Children should sing with this head voice at all times. Singing with a light tone will insure carrying the head voice downward through the entire scale. The teacher should, however, guard against such expressions as "Sing softly" or "Sing with tiny voices." They are apt to result in a breathy devitalized type of singing which is not a natural childlike expression. Good tone quality is to a great degree based upon imagination, spontaneity, and light singing (2:2).

Berg emphasized the importance of helping children develop their own expressive interpretation of a song. He stated the following:

As has been pointed out, a child may be led to develop appropriate musical expression through his concept of the mood and the imagery of the text and melody. The song should by its very nature, then, suggest an appropriate tone quality, or "color." Although the children at first imitate the tone and manner of the teacher's presentation of a particular song, they can be guided to go beyond mere imitation. If they are helped in their own expressive interpretation of a song and if they learn that there are various possibilities in song interpretation, they will have been provided with a firm foundation for musical growth (3:172).

The general concensus of the author's opinions concerning the type of music program desirable was in favor of a special music period and the integration of music in the whole school program. They seemed to feel children as well as teachers should take an active part in the evaluation of song literature. They also believed that with singing experience, the child will increase the range of the voice with clear, flutelike tone quality.

CHAPTER IV

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The effort to compile a listing of all the song literature available for use in first grade of public school has made possible certain conclusions.

Summary

The present writer reviewed all the music literature available from fourteen well-known first grade texts. Each piece of music or song literature was then read and placed under one or more general content headings determined by the type of music and/or by the subject content of the song. These content headings were arbitrarily established by the author in an effort to correlate music with the whole school program.

In order to determine the value of the correlative approach, criteria of song literature, and the desired range and qualities of the child voice, a further study of literature was made.

The authors seemed to believe in a formal and an informal school music program. They believe a special time should be set aside for music, but also that informal music may be integrated with science, social studies, arts, or recreation for release from tension. Further, the authors seem to feel a beautiful song will add interest, meaning, and enjoyment to other areas of the curriculum.

Under the criteria of song literature, the authors seemed to believe a good song is one that children will like, will enjoy singing and will remember. It seems to be essentially an interesting melody that is easily remembered and prompts a definite rhythmic response. The poem or text of the song fits the rhythmic scheme and melody line. Each song must stand on its own merit.

The child voice was described by the authors. It is light in quality as well as in volume. Good tone quality is clear, flute-like, unforced, not breathy, and easily sustained. They described the range of the voice of the average young child as being from Middle C to C, D, or E above. However, the very young child with little music experience would not have so wide a range, and the experienced child singer will have increased his range to 5th line (on the staff) F and above.

Conclusions

The writer learned of the tremendous amount of music literature that is available for use in first grade alone. Fourteen first grade texts with a wealth of information and music literature were found. The newer texts provide excellent colored illustrations, background information on each piece of music, chords, suggested activities and accompaniment.

The music literature covered nearly all subject areas. However, there were no songs which referred to up-to-date scientific achievements or science fiction activities or machines like outer space rockets, missiles, and time machines.

The writer is more convinced than ever that this bibliography can be of assistance to first grade teachers. Through it they can become aware of the wealth of music literature available at their level. They should also be able to use greater discrimination in the quality of music selected within a subject area.

The drawbacks to successfully doing this type of research are in attempting to obtain all available material in order to make a complete bibliographical listing.

In this paper, the author's increased growth in the ability to read and interpret music required several revisions of the early text of the bibliography. Also, texts with a more recent copyright date provided more general and specific information on each individual piece of music.

It is obvious that a complete task of providing an annotated bibliography could not be compiled for all grades within the confines of this research paper. A need for continued similar research is indicated. This type research would also be of value in the area of poetry.
