DEVELOPING MARKETING PLANS TO EXPAND OPTIONS

Marketing to Expand Options

Benefits Planning, Assistance and Outreach Projects (BPA&O) and Protection and Advocacy for Beneficiaries of Social Security Projects (PABSS) are a new and important part of the Ticket to Work and Work Incentives Improvement Act work incentives infrastructure. These services, coupled with other provisions outlined in the Act, provide an important network of supports to assist beneficiaries and recipients of Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI) in making informed choices about preparing for, attaching to and advancing in employment.

Given the newness of this infrastructure, even though some awarded agencies and organizations have been providing similar supports prior to the passage of the Work Incentives Improvement Act, it is important for projects to assess the extent to which they are currently marketing their services and supports and their effectiveness in this area. Marketing is an important tool in the practitioner's tool belt for expanding options and intentionally increasing impact.

There are five basic strategies and steps to effective marketing:

1. Understanding the skills and expertise you bring to the field.
2. Understanding your agency's goals, objectives and services in relation to this field.
3. Understanding what you are setting out to accomplish and with whom you will accomplish it.
4. Putting a plan into action.
5. Measuring outcomes achieved and overall satisfaction with services and supports provided.

Understanding Yourself Your Agency

To assist you in identifying a baseline of services and supports a Self-Assessment/Agency Assessment checklist is provided in Appendix A. Each job function is broken down by major responsibilities. First, identify whether the assessment instrument is being completed for an individual or agency. Second, reviewing each item, check whether:

- Activity/service/support is provided
- If not provided, referral can be initiated for activity/service/support
- Expertise is evident to conduct function
- Expertise needs to be further developed
- Frequency of activity/service/support
- Duration of time allocated to activity/service/support

Understanding the Environment —
Mission Analysis

This assessment can serve as an important tool in helping the practitioner to understand their baseline of skills; helping the agency to identify services available and fill gaps; and, enhance the competency and expertise of staff currently providing these services and supports and quality of the same.

Reviewing the self-assessment checklist, identify those areas where further skill development was needed. Write those specific skills in need of development and brainstorm with the group potential goals and objectives that could enhance that specific area. For example:

Skill: Managing a case load

Plan: a. Pair up with a mentor

b. Gather information from a case manager in a community agency

c. Participate in Case Load Management 101 at the community college

SKILL

4.

Completing this assessment process will help you learn as an individual where your specific skills and expertise are; the products and services you and/or your agency provide; and begin to design an initial plan for enhancing your current baseline. Using the self-assessment information collected, a profile should be developed outlining the extent of BPA&O/PABSS services provided and placement of those services. The next step in developing the plan requires a thorough environmental analysis.

To conduct a comprehensive analysis of the environment in which you live and work, information must be collected in three areas:

- mission analysis
- resource analysis
- marketing analysis (Stakeholder Analysis – Appendix B.)

What is our mission?

1. What is our primary business?
2. Who are our customers? (See Stakeholder Analysis)
3. What needs are we trying to meet?
4. What are our products and services? (See Self/Agency Assessment)
5. What do we want to be in the future?

The Role of Feature–
Advantage–
Benefit Marketing
in Establishing Mutual Gains

As reflected in the Self/Agency Assessment, an array of services and supports may be offered by a particular individual or agency to varying degrees. As referenced in the earlier analysis an important element is further refining what your primary products and services are. This will be further broken down later into specialized services and products for secondary markets in the marketing analysis section.

Understanding the features, advantages, and benefits or services and supports you deliver is essential to establishing mutual gains.

Feature	Advantage	Benefit
What the service is	What it can offer	What it can do for the customer

For example, a feature of your program may be benefits profiling/screening. The advantage is that it offers the individual being served an opportunity to comprehensively profile their current financial status. A benefit would be that it affords the customer a picture of their current situation against which to gauge different employment scenarios prior to decision-making.

Take a few moments to outline a few features of services you and/or your agency provide related to benefits planning and assistance, making sure to outline the advantages and benefits.

Feature	Advantage	Benefit
2.
3.
4.

Keep in mind one feature may have several advantages and benefits. In turn, these may inadvertently prove an advantage and benefit to secondary markets as well.

Understanding
Your Resources*What are our resources?

1. What are our strengths?
2. What are our weaknesses and constraints?
3. What unique resources do we have available to us?

Personnel?

Track-record?

Location?

Contacts/Networks?

Image?

4. What information, data, or records are available to us for customer research?

---

Understanding
Your Marketing
Situation*What trends are impacting us?

1. Environment — What are the major trends affecting our business and our customers?

Economic?

Political?

Technological?

Socio-cultural?

	<ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>2. How are the above items problems and/or opportunities?</li><li>3. Who are the public we serve? (See Stakeholder Analysis)</li><li>4. What are our “target” markets? (See Stakeholder Analysis)  Primary:  Secondary:</li><li>5. What market segments exist? (Specific services for specific customers see “Matching” section below)</li><li>6. What is our “position” in the market place? (What is different about your service from that of other providers?)</li></ol>
Important Stakeholders	Critical to expanding options are several important stakeholders, including: individuals with disabilities, their families, their service providers, their advocates, their planners, their supporters, and SSA. Beneficiaries and Recipients with Disabilities The core of a practitioner’s network is the beneficiaries and recipients who require benefits planning and assistance services and supports. Rapport and trust are the important elements of relationship building with this group. Past successes will further expand this network. Negative or unsuccessful experiences may pose an obstacle as to how others will perceive the services and supports provided. Family Members As with beneficiaries and recipients, their family members are another prime stakeholder to invest as part of the practitioner’s network. As important as the trust and rapport built is the extent to which the practitioner “listens” to needs, concerns and fears expressed by family members. In some cases, benefits received by the individual may in part support the financial well being of the person’s immediate family. Investment and information sharing with this group is essential and may play another large role in expanding the practitioner’s network.

Advocates

Advocates are broadly defined to include: peer counselors, independent living personnel, legal representation, due process representatives, and others charged with defending, supporting or advocating on behalf of the beneficiary or recipient. The savvy practitioner will understand the significance this group has as part of an effective network. While most would agree the beneficiary or recipient is the practitioner's primary customer, they do have secondary customers, which may include funders of their services. Here we begin to outline a struggle that may potentially exist as practitioners define their role in providing advocacy-related support. It is important to be aware of the impact advocacy may have on secondary customers, especially when providing counsel to individuals on actions they may need to take. An effective network would include linkages and relationships with and advocates within the geographic area being targeted affording, affording the practitioner a greater opportunity to refer the beneficiary and/or recipient in cases where potential conflict of interest may exist.

Service Providers

This is an important stakeholder group for practitioners, providing the services and supports that their customers may need but that they are not able, or equipped, to provide. This would include: employment networks, residential programs, providers of community rehabilitation services, state agencies, workforce investment councils, and other groups with specific areas of expertise. It is not expected that the practitioner be an expert in all areas, but that when the case arises, they have the ability to network their customers with those that do (e.g. rehabilitation counseling, vocational assessment, supported employment, community living, etc). This group is also an important consumer of information and training that the practitioner may make available as well as an important referral source.

Planners/Case Managers

Planners and case managers are another important stakeholder group to invest in the benefits planning and assistance process. Often, beneficiaries and recipients are already attached to another service delivery system. Whether it is state vocational rehabilitation, the mental retardation and developmental disability system, or the mental health system, these individuals probably already actively participate in some sort of formal service delivery planning process, which is outlined in a planning document. Planners and case managers, besides being another potential referral source, may also play a key role in establishing long-term benefits planning and assistance supports. As the designers of individualized service delivery plans they have the ability to integrate goals and objectives concerning benefits management that may result in the individual's long-term success.

	Support Personnel Support personnel are those individuals in a beneficiary/recipient's lives that have specific roles and responsibilities in supporting the person on a regular basis. These people are important members of the practitioner's network as they are providers of reliable qualitative information as to what is going on in the individual's life, where support needs exist, and potential safety net strategies. This group would also benefit from information and resource sharing and serve as a potential referral source. SSA Last but not least, SSA is a vital partner. The effective practitioner will maintain close relations and connections to both their local, state, and regional SSA office. Locally, they can establish important relationships and reporting protocols with claims representatives and employment support representatives (ESR). At the state level they can keep abreast of proposed changes coming down the road and maintain relationships with PASS Specialists and ESRs. At the regional level they can learn about other effective practices and regional rollout of special demonstrations and events. Benefits planning and assistance is about establishing partnerships that enhance the self-sufficiency and economic wellness of beneficiaries and recipients while at the same time supporting their employment interests.
Stakeholder Analysis Exercise	Working with a small group from your agency or by yourself, conduct a Stakeholder Analysis. This is another important step in developing a broad marketing plan for benefits planning and assistance services and supports. This will help you identify whom your network and other stakeholders, who need to be brought into the fold. The Stakeholder Analysis is provided in Appendix B.
Strategies for Network Building	There are several ways to expand personal and professional networks within your community and geographic area being served. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. Research agencies and schools through advertising, trade journals and newspapers</li> <li>2. Become familiar with the array of services, supports and products available within your community targeted to individuals with disabilities</li> <li>3. Research local needs and trends</li> <li>4. Find out who decision makers are in specific stakeholder groups you are targeting</li> <li>5. Participate in broad array of functions and activities offered around the human services community</li> </ol>

	<ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>6. Join/participate in human services coalitions/consortia</li><li>7. Tap into existing networks you maintain to secure advice and recommendations for broadening network</li><li>8. Talk to other divisions or agencies and schools you or your agency does business with or intersects frequently</li><li>9. Seek referrals from everyone – let your community know what you are attempting to do and how you can help</li><li>10. Offer secondary services and products to members of your network</li><li>11. Develop and disseminate informational materials including fact sheets, brochures and cover letters using both direct mail and Internet applications, such as listservs, to get your message out into the community</li><li>12. Enhance education and human interest through face-to-face contact. Participate in events such as college fairs and job fairs and provide community education programs/presentations</li><li>13. Secure references from existing members of your network and past satisfied customers</li></ol> Provide media releases of successes and stories of human interest
Important Step in Developing a Network	Creating Mutual Gains As network members are beginning to be recruited, it is important to answer some preliminary questions to begin establishing mutual gains--an approach that employs the identification of mutual interests to resolve differences and establish common ground. This includes: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Identifying what the end-result benefit is to both parties</li><li>• What potential problems our collaboration may be able to resolve</li><li>• Why someone would want this</li><li>• How this might help both parties or individuals being served gain recognition, self-esteem, or a better quality product</li><li>• How the other party or individuals being served might enjoy greater profit; and/or,</li><li>• How future crisis may be avoided.</li></ul> Establishing Trust Establishing trust and rapport with an individual or stakeholder group is a human variable that must be addressed. The effective practitioner can accomplish this in several ways. First, being available is an important and often underrated trait. In this age of e-mail, voice mail, and automated phone answering systems it can often be difficult to connect with another human being. Positioning yourself as accessible and available to your network will ultimately result in being relied on as a consistent mechanism for information and other services. In our age of quality management initiatives it can't be emphasized enough the role that "What I can do for you" v. "What can you do for me" can play in building trust and establishing rapport. When attempting to establish trust the practitioner should never err on the side of over-promising what they can deliver. Establishing success stories up front and securing references and recommendation will go a long way in others building trust and confidence in your services and supports.

Building Collaboration

Building collaboration and making community connections is critical to expanding benefits planning and assistance networks. For the most part, connections with others will increase opportunities to: build on a community's strengths; provide for the whole person; increase potential for survival and growth; and potentially improve cost-effectiveness.

Factors that impede connections:

- Fear of putting the people we serve at risk possibly because we may need to give up some responsibility; we feel we know the person best; it won't get done unless we do it ourselves
- Easier to just do it yourself
- No history of coordination or bad history
- Needs are immediate
- Little knowledge of available services, goals, operations
- Able to operate independently
- Turf issues and pride
- Always done it this way
- Don't have the time

Factors that foster connections:

- Recognition and sensitivity to differences
- Understanding each person's and agency's goals, operations and services
- Complementary goals with similar values and philosophy
- Voluntarily entered relationships
- Support from management
- Scarce resources and fostered interdependency
- Mutual gains established
- Mutual planning
- Frequent opportunity for information exchange
- Capacity for data management and sharing of outcomes
- Well organized and intended connections
- Gradual implementation
- Ongoing evaluation of outcomes of connections

Maintaining an Effective Network

---

As a garden, a network is only as effective as the amount of time put into nurturing it. To simply have a list of agencies and individuals on a piece of paper is not enough. The practitioner needs to intentionally foster planned intersections with their network--regular points in time when either information and resources are shared, updates are provided, or other activities are planned that are essential to the livelihood and wellness of the network. A log for recording stakeholder contacts is an important tool. It not only provides a record of who the practitioners have been in contact with but also the topic and potential outcomes. This contact log will prove useful in several areas:

- Tracking outreach activities
- Tracking short-term advisement, technical assistance, or problem solving
- Tracking marketing activities
- Logging community training
- Documenting networking activities

Matching Stakeholders to a Menu of Available Services and Supports

---

As important as identifying essential stakeholders is understanding their unique service and support delivery needs. While most practitioners will be primarily concerned with meeting the benefits planning and assistance and/or protection and advocacy needs of beneficiaries and recipients, the successful practitioner will also understand that there may be separate products or services that secondary customers may require and benefit from.

For example, a local supported employment provider may have an interest in providing informational materials to new customers referred to them for service on how employment may impact benefits. It might be to the practitioner's benefit to work with that agency to craft a flyer that briefly explains impact and serves as a referral tool for future benefits planning and assistance.

Meeting Needs of a Network
Exercise

Using the template provided below, excerpt three stakeholders from your initial stakeholder analysis and identify potential secondary products or services. This should not include your primary services of screening, benefits advisement, or benefits management.

	Customer	Product and/or Services
	1.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> </ul>
	2.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> </ul>
	3.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> <li>•</li> </ul>
Strategic Plan Development, Implementation and Evaluation	Information from steps one and two guide the development of a strategic plan. A strategic plan should include several elements: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• What is to be accomplished with goals and objectives</li> <li>• Specific person(s) responsible for each step</li> <li>• Timeframe for implementation</li> <li>• Outline of resources to be used</li> <li>• Indicators of success for measurement</li> <li>• Strategies for how plan will be modified if desired outcomes were not achieved</li> </ul> Once implemented, a quality plan will provide specific guidance as to how the plan's effectiveness should be evaluated. Focusing on several variables: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Did it accomplish its purpose?</li> <li>• Did it impact specific areas identified?</li> <li>• Were the methods used the ones proposed?</li> <li>• Was the outcome of the plan consistent with agency objectives?</li> <li>• If the desired outcomes were not achieved, what's next?</li> </ul>
Final Thoughts	A strategic marketing plan should not just outline new target markets, services and products. It should also clearly define how services and products will continue to be enhanced and improved; how staff providing services will continue to be developed; how ongoing assessment and programmatic evaluation will be conducted; and the role that customer feedback will play into this continuous quality improvement process.
