Climbing Brace Mountain

Same route, but every year more strain.
The mountain stays, we change.
Gravity is the war that no one wins, yet all must fight.
But rarely so brazenly declared as here today. You, with your bum knee, winded from the start, and me, in Birkenstocks and socks, stumbling up the leaf-slick chutes, then scrambling higher, steeper, clinging to low-hung branches, gouged-out roots, bracing against crevassed faces of Taconic gneiss.
Up and up through all the yellow halls of autumn to the leaf-blown heights, then out to that bare, bedrocked knoll where the thicket opens its fist, and light speaks to light without end.
