The University of Maine

DigitalCommons@UMaine

Maine History Documents

Special Collections

1900

Views of Maine's Rhine and Vicinity: Penobscot River

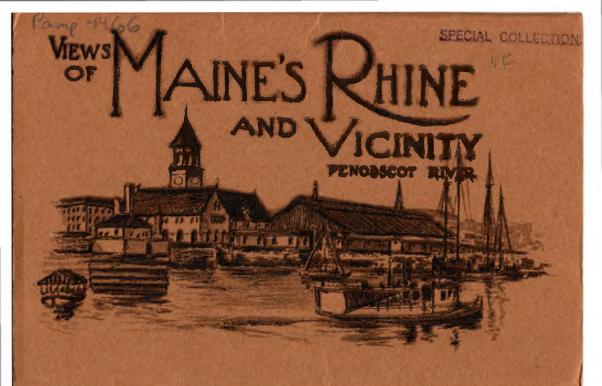

O. Crosby Bean

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.library.umaine.edu/mainehistory

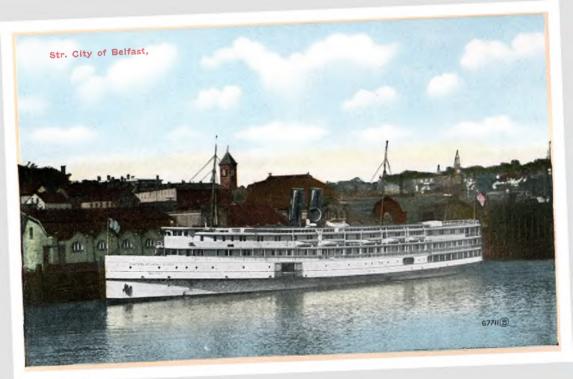

Part of the History Commons

This Monograph is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@UMaine. It has been accepted for inclusion in Maine History Documents by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@UMaine. For more information, please contact um.library.technical.services@maine.edu.

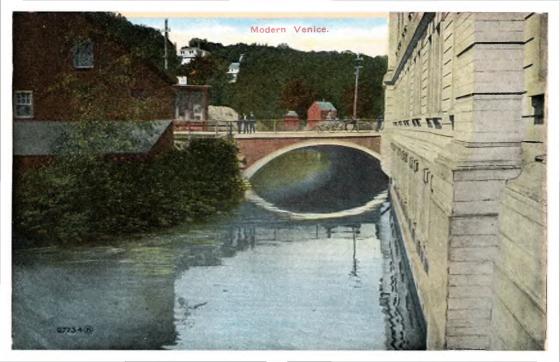

Towing through the Hampden Narrows-Penobscot River, Me.

Vessels in the older days beating up through these narrows, from the West Indies, would accidentally lose overboard a cask of Rum or Molasses, to be picked up by their watchful friends on shore, and taken to the Smuggling Hole—which was on the right hand shore, thus evading the Custom Officials at Bangor.

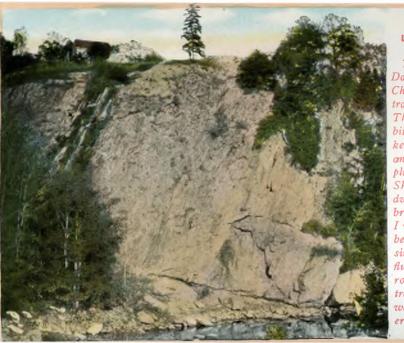

The Indian Legend of this Rock is that "at the first crow of the Rooster in the early morn, the rock turns over." The Sandy Head on the opposite shore is where the British soldiers landed in their overland murch to the Battle of Hampden, Sept. 3rd, 1814.

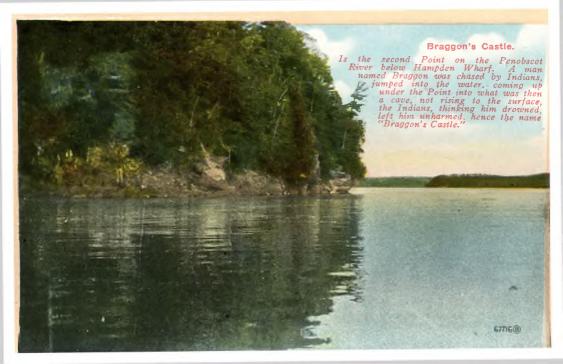

BANGOR, ME. LOVERS' LEAP

Tahiti, a beautiful Daughter of a noted Chief, loved an Indian trabebr named Shawano. The Father, being ambitious, chose Kishwakee, a wealthy brave of another tribe. She reblied: "If I may not wed Shawano, I would ever dwell with thee, but the bride of KISHWAKEE, I will NEVER, NEVER be." Years have passed since those fond lovers flung themselves off that rocky steep, but the traveler still discovers what is called "The Lovers' Leap."

Str. City of Belfast, Opposite Long Wharf, Hampden, Me.

Here the guns from the American Covette Adam's were taken out by her Commander, Charles Morris and mounted on the Heights below the Wharf, to oppose the advance of the British up the river at the Battle of Hampden, Sept. 3rd, 1814. To keep the vessel from falling into the hands of the British she was blown up and burnt; what was left, sinking at the first point below the canoe wharf.

Str. Camden in the Hampden Narrows, Penobscot River, Me.

On the side of the Bluff on the left is a Red Ledge, which the Indians called the Blood Rock, water running from it would be red and was considered a great medicine by the Indians.

SOUVENIA GOODS, ELHOOR, ME PUB. BY O. CROSBY BEAN