Rzicznek: Thicket IV

THICKET IV

F. Daniel Rzicznek

The forest is white with the month,
blank as an acre of rain.

The brief tale in which the mind sews a pasture out of timber, fescue writhing day on day higher, the cattle meant for meat released to fill their bellies with sky and earth.
The mind in the mean time invents a blade to be swung, a hook to sink.
The fescue rises taller and lower depending on the year, the cattle milling in shade or resting under clouds, the mind killing them now and then until the day a train flows past.
Saplings uproot the pasture, limbs growing dense as the decades roll where cattle and fescue thrived.

The forest is white with the month,
blank as an acre of rain.
