

Opioid peptides play a role as local regulator of ovarian function. Such mechanism of action is particularly evident in non-mammalian vertebrates whereas in mammals the experimental findings here reviewed do not allow a similar conclusion to be drawn. Paracrine communication appears to be relatively more important at earlier stages of the evolutionary tree, whereas the increase in complexity with phylogenesis requires endocrine rather than paracrine mechanisms for the control of reproductive processes.