

THE UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH

Edinburgh Research Explorer

Susan Meiselas, Awaiting Counter Attack by the Guard in Nicaragua, Matagalpa, 1978; “Ann Parker, Country boy with cityscape, Sololá ca. 1970s

Citation for published version:

Selejan, IL 2019, Susan Meiselas, Awaiting Counter Attack by the Guard in Nicaragua, Matagalpa, 1978; “Ann Parker, Country boy with cityscape, Sololá ca. 1970s. in J Oles (ed.), Art_Latin_America: Against the Survey. University of Texas Press, Austin, Texas, pp. 62-63; 132-133.

Link:

Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:

Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Published In:

Art_Latin_America

General rights

Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy

The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

ART — LATIN — AMERICA

ART — LATIN — AMERICA

AGAINST THE SURVEY

EDITED BY James Oles
WITH LISA FISCHMAN

Published in conjunction with the exhibition
Art_Latin_America: Against the Survey
Davis Museum at Wellesley College
February 7–June 9, 2019

Curated by James Oles, Adjunct Curator of Latin American Art at the Davis Museum and Senior Lecturer in the Art Department at Wellesley College. The exhibition and catalogue were realized with generous funding from:

Wellesley College Friends of Art at the Davis
Judith Blough Wentz '57 Museum
Programs Fund
Mellon Endowment for Academic Programs
at the Davis Museum
The Helyn MacLean Endowed Program Fund
for Contemporary and South Asian Art
The James Wilson Rayen Museum Gift
Elizabeth Firestone Graham Foundation

Cover:

cat.148_Liliana Porter
Simulaciones con espacio gris
(Simulations with Gray Space), 1995
Detail

Endpapers:

cat.147_Hector Alonzo Benavides
Untitled, 2000
Detail

All texts © 2019 Davis Museum at Wellesley
College and the authors

For artwork copyright, see Artist Index.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form or by any electronic or mechanical means, including information storage and retrieval systems,
without written permission from the publisher,
except in the case of brief quotations
embodied in critical articles and reviews.

Designed by Stoltze Design, Boston, MA
Printed by Puritan Capital, Hollis, NH
Copyedited by Hannah Townsend
Photography by Steve Briggs

ISBN 978-1-4773-1909-3

University of Texas Press
3001 Lake Austin Boulevard
Stop E4800
Austin, TX 78703-4206
<https://utpress.utexas.edu>

CONTENTS

- 6_ FOREWORD LISA FISCHMAN
- 8_ ART LATIN AMERICA: FILLING IN THE BLANKS JAMES OLES
- 24_ IDENTITY AND TERRITORY
- 46_ WAR AND LOSS
- 74_ PROTEST AND PROPAGANDA
- 100_ FARMERS AND WORKERS
- 118_ RURAL AND URBAN
- 154_ SAINTS AND RITUALS
- 174_ MODELS AND MOTHERS
- 206_ GESTURE AND GEOMETRY
- 248_ AUTHORS' BIOGRAPHIES
- 254_ ARTIST INDEX
- 256_ ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Taken in the town of Matagalpa, in the northern highlands of Nicaragua, this photograph documents a scene from the armed insurrection against the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza. It shows a group of young men, muchachos as they were called, standing guard on one of the city blocks, sheltered by a barricade. The graffiti on the wall behind them is illegible, although it may have spelled out the name of someone disappeared by the National Guard. A torn piece of paper above the figure on the left reads FSLN, the initials of the Sandinista National Liberation Front, while the lettering behind him reads GPP or Guerra Popular Prolongada (Protracted People's War), the militant strategy employed by the revolutionary Sandinista movement to upset the Somoza regime. Such small, yet meaningful details impart a fuller sense of time and place to the image, bearing witness to a series of transformative events surrounding the Nicaraguan revolution of 1978–79.

Magnum photographer Susan Meiselas travelled extensively throughout the country during this period. Here, as in many of her other pictures, the scene shows a revolution launched by everyday people, in everyday circumstances, on everyday streets. Dressed in regular clothing, the men here disguise their faces with a handkerchief, a bandanna, a t-shirt, a piece of cloth. Red and black were the identifying colors of the FSLN. Other details connect the photograph to wider networks; one of the caps reads “New Orleans,” perhaps an acknowledgement of less overt economic ties to the North. This sense of familiarity can be overwhelming and contradictory, bearing in mind the reality of the violence taking place.

The scene presents itself as orderly, given the context. Most of the men are unarmed, a shocking realization considering that they are awaiting retaliation by the heavily armed National Guard. Such disjunctions heighten the tension already present in the scene. Only one of the men looks, and vaguely, at the camera. Has this photograph been entirely posed? Does it tell us anything about what is actually going on? Instead of spectacle, we are offered a scene both shocking and banal. In comparison to customary news pictures, especially those showing conflict and war, there is a blatant lack of action and drama.

The Sandinista revolution was one of the most documented events in recent history, as photographers from all over the world—particularly from Latin America, the United States, and Europe—came to witness and record the momentous events. Meiselas's pictures were published in the press immediately, and later in book form; the present photograph graced the cover of Nicaragua: June 1978–July 1979.¹ They were revisited by the photographer in subsequent film (1991) and mural (2004) projects, and have remained relevant even as mass protests have once again swept through the country. Shared by Nicaraguans on social media, Meiselas's pictures continue to draw parallels across four decades, reigniting imaginaries of resistance and dissent.

—Ileana L. Selejan

1 Susan Meiselas, Nicaragua: June 1978–July 1979 (New York: Pantheon Books, 1981).

cat.24_Susan Meiselas

Baltimore, Maryland 1948

Awaiting Counter Attack by the Guard in Matagalpa, Nicaragua, 1978 (printed later)

Chromogenic print, 16 × 20 in. (40.6 × 50.8 cm)

Museum purchase, The Dorothy Johnston Towne
(Class of 1923) Fund, 2002.72

Left
fig.30_Ann Parker
London, England 1934
Young Couple with Cityscape,
Sololá, 1970s
Gelatin silver print,
12 × 8 in. (30.5 × 20.3 cm)
Museum purchase, Ina Brown
Ramer (Class of 1956) Endowed Fund for Acquisitions and Educational Program Support,
2016.106

Throughout the 1970s, US photographer Ann Parker documented the work—now obsolete—of itinerant photographers across Guatemala. She trained her lens on practitioners and their subjects alike.¹ The ambulantes, also known as fotógrafos de cajón, fotógrafos de caballito, and minuterios, produced the most common portraits in Central and South America, at least until the advent of digital photography. Whether taken for pragmatic purposes, such as identification cards, or as aide-memoires, these pictures have only survived, if at all, in family albums. Unlike their photo-studio counterparts, itinerant photographers rarely kept the paper negatives produced by their artisanal box-cameras.

The color photograph of a young boy was taken in Sololá, on Lake Atitlán. Parker watches as he is told to stand perfectly still for a few seconds, the time needed to make an impression on the paper negative. His eyes are fixated on a point far to his left, perhaps in awareness of the distance between his world—the world of the picture—and that of the viewer. A band of light on the floor, just beneath the backdrop, separates the real from the imaginary. His gestures reveal nervous tension, as well as an uncertainty about how to stand and what to do with his hands—emotions anyone sitting for a formal portrait might experience. The unexpected juxtaposition of his traditional Maya clothing and the modern cityscape behind him—which shows Guatemala City’s main square, with the National Palace and the Cathedral—might be read as an affirmation of civic pride or perhaps of participatory citizenship, though not necessarily evidence of a desire to move to the capital or enter the mainstream of social power. Other backdrops curiously depict remote locations, as in Parker’s photograph of a Maya couple posing in front of one labeled “Avenida Wilson, Lima”—a rendition that was most probably inspired by a postcard.

Nonetheless, the brutal events unfolding in the Guatemalan countryside during the 1970s, around the time these photographs were made, unsettle this stance, as the co-existence of indigenous citizens—their participation in the national project from a position of equality—was being questioned by the state. Throughout the long-lasting Guatemalan civil war, deliberate attempts were made to strip indigenous individuals of their dignity, their rights, and often their very lives in a continued questioning of their belonging to the nation. Yet the extent of that violence remains invisible in the box-camera pictures. Their purpose was instead celebratory, as they were usually taken at fairs or during holidays.

Details that were to be disguised in the “actual” pictures—hanging strings, leftover items, the photographer’s accoutrements—are left in plain sight in Parker’s images. She does not seek to sustain the artifice; the magic of the backdrop is revealed as a fiction, and we see the entire scenography—the canvas slightly elevated above the ground, its edges pressed against the edge of the picture frame. Yet none of these sitters addresses Parker’s camera, and their identities remain entirely unknown. These are “stolen” pictures, taken from the side, of a world-image that was separate, and that may have deliberately kept itself separate from the visitor’s gaze. As artist Benvenuto Chavajay argued when discussing this very picture, in the Maya worldview, people still believe photographs can steal a person’s spirit.² For a picture not to take away their spirit-image, sitters had to “own” their image, to feel like it was theirs entirely, which is precisely what the itinerant photographers allowed. Yet whatever the ethical concerns raised by Parker’s project, her snapshots record, in color and black-and-white, a cultural practice that would otherwise be lost.

—Ileana L. Selejan

1 This work is documented in Ann Parker and Avon Neal, Los Ambulantes: The Itinerant Photographers of Guatemala (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1982).

2 Conversation with the author in Managua, Nicaragua, May 2018.

Opposite
cat.74_Ann Parker
London, England 1934

Country Boy in front of National Palace Backdrop, Sololá, 1970s
Silver-dye bleach print, 20 × 14½ in. (50.8 × 36.8 cm)
Museum purchase, Ina Brown Ramer (Class of 1956) Endowed Fund for Acquisitions and Educational Program Support, 2016.105

PALACIO NACIONAL, GUATEMALA, C.A.

