

University of HUDDERSFIELD

University of Huddersfield Repository

Kelly, Stephen

An Oral History of Footballing Communities at Liverpool and Manchester United Football Clubs

Original Citation

Kelly, Stephen (2009) An Oral History of Footballing Communities at Liverpool and Manchester United Football Clubs. Doctoral thesis, University of Huddersfield.

This version is available at <http://eprints.hud.ac.uk/7060/>

The University Repository is a digital collection of the research output of the University, available on Open Access. Copyright and Moral Rights for the items on this site are retained by the individual author and/or other copyright owners. Users may access full items free of charge; copies of full text items generally can be reproduced, displayed or performed and given to third parties in any format or medium for personal research or study, educational or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge, provided:

- The authors, title and full bibliographic details is credited in any copy;
- A hyperlink and/or URL is included for the original metadata page; and
- The content is not changed in any way.

For more information, including our policy and submission procedure, please contact the Repository Team at: E.mailbox@hud.ac.uk.

<http://eprints.hud.ac.uk/>

PhD by Publication

*An Oral History of Footballing Communities
at Liverpool and
Manchester United Football Clubs*

*The Kop
Red Voices
The Boot Room Boys*

Stephen F. Kelly

University of Huddersfield,

School of Music, Humanities
& Media

June 2009

Table of Contents

Abstract	p.3
Introduction	p.4
Literature Review	p.10
Thematic Review of the Current Academic Debates	p.18
The Submission	p.28
The Pre-1960s Experience of Fandom: People's Fandom	p.30
The 1960s and 70s: The Emergence of Fanatical Fandom.	p.34
The 1990s: The Bourgeoisification of Football Fandom	p.46
Conclusion:	p.48
General Note:	p.53
Methodology	p.54
Bibliography	p.58
List of Interviewees	p.62

Abstract

My three cited studies, The Kop, Red Voices and The Boot Room Boys, focus on two English football clubs, Liverpool and Manchester United and some of the footballing communities within these clubs. All three books use oral history as means of detailing various aspects for historical study.

The clubs have been deliberately chosen because they rank as the most successful and best supported clubs in English football. Red Voices is an oral history of fans at Manchester United and as such is a wider examination of the social history of the club's fans and the culture of fandom at Old Trafford since the 1930s. The two other books are about Liverpool Football Club and focus on different communities. The Kop focuses on a particular area of the ground known as the Spion Kop, where the most fervent of Liverpool fans used to stand but now sit. The other book, The Boot Room Boys, focuses on a community that is centred on the club's coaching staff who took up residence in the club's boot room beneath the Main stand. This room took on mythical proportions during the 1960s, 70s and 80s when the club's successes seemed to have emanated from the discussions, tactics and approach of its occupants.

Across these three publications interviews have been conducted with more than 250 people ranging from ordinary fans to owners, directors, players, administrators and managers. By drawing on this wide range of personal experiences, many going back to before the Second World War, it is possible to gauge the importance of the various communities to the footballing map and to ascertain the various changes that have taken place in the culture of football.

Backed by extensive research, the reader is able to reconsider the history of football spectatorship in the twentieth century through the experiences of pre-generational fans. My findings suggest that spectatorship divides into three distinct: the pre-1960s; the period 1962 to 1989; and the post Hillsborough period, 1989 to the present. The interviews detail the social, ethnic and gender makeup of spectators throughout the years and also reveal important findings on rites of passage and the role played by fathers and elder siblings in the initiation of younger people into spectatorship. Ritual also emerges as a crucial element in spectatorship. In the case of Liverpool Football Club the interviews suggest that being a 'Kopite' is a crucial statement in terms of social identity. Anfield, the home of Liverpool is also identified as the focal point for the emergence of chanting and singing by fans on the terraces in the 1960s. Fashion at Liverpool and hooliganism at Manchester United are shown to have been important in the later period identified as 'fanatical fandom'. And finally there is evidence from the interviews to suggest that significant cultural changes in fandom have taken place with the introduction of all-seater stadia.

Not only does this testimony highlight the social history of spectatorship but it also encourages a new perspective, based on the individual experience which can also include emotional responses to spectatorship. In doing so this has had the effect of fleshing out the history of football, enabling it to break free from the traditional perspective of events on the pitch towards the inter-relationship between sport and everyday life.

Introduction

In the last five years the study of sport as history and as a sociological phenomenon has become an accepted academic discipline within British universities. Indeed, sport has long been an accepted area of study in American universities. The emergence of sports history, sports journalism, and sports studies as respected degree pathways has provided a further impetus for the study of sport.¹

Similarly oral history has been regarded as an imperative and empirical method of recording people's experiences. In the discipline of labour history and social history, the use of oral interviews has proved to be a rich and valid means for investigating the daily working activities, conflicts, protests, and family relationships of ordinary people. But until recently an examination of leisure time, leisure activities and sport, through oral testimony was not considered a rich area for the oral historian.²

Since then an increasing number of sports historians, in exploring the social development of sport, have turned to oral interviews as a means of exploring the concept of sport and its development.

These three books (The Kop, Red Voices and The Boot Room Boys) were among the first attempts at exploring the use of oral history in a sporting context. Cricket Voices (Bose, 1990) was possibly the first commercially published oral history to look at some aspect of sport; in this case cricket. The Kop was the first oral history of its kind to cover football. Below is a brief summary of each of the publications.

a) Kelly, S. F. (2005) The Kop: Liverpool's Twelfth Man. London, Virgin.

This book was the first oral history publication to focus on football fandom as a legitimate area of study. It was first published in 1993 as an original paperback by Mandarin to coincide with the closure of the Kop, the terracing behind one of the goals at the Anfield Road stadium, home of Liverpool Football Club. It was titled The Kop: The End of an Era. The closure of the Kop in 1993 made it an ideal time to conduct such an oral history.

¹ Mason, T. (1988) Sport in Britain. London, Faber & Faber p. 69, noted the growing acceptance of sport as a serious academic study when he wrote that 'the sociology of sport...has become a vigorous sub-discipline in universities and colleges.' Since then the number and range of academic journals and academic societies devoted to sport also lends credence to this point. De Monfort University has a long tradition involving the study of sport. In 2003, the University of Huddersfield introduced a degree in Sports Journalism, the first of its kind in Europe.

² In the spring of 1997, Oral History, the journal of the Oral History Society, devoted an entire issue to sport. An editorial commented that 'this is the first issue of Oral History devoted to the theme of sport, which reflects the fact that until recently little attention has been directed to oral accounts of 'ordinary' people's sporting activities. Whilst there have been hagiographies and biographies of sporting stars, few have used oral evidence and where they have done, precious few tapes have found their way to public archives or libraries.'

The Kop was subsequently reprinted seven times over the next ten years. In 2005 it was republished by a new publisher, Virgin, with a new cover and an additional chapter which took into account the experiences of the new seated Kop. No text from the previous publication was omitted. It was however retitled as The Kop: Liverpool's Twelfth Man. It is this later edition that I have used in referencing.

Through a series of interviews with fans, employees of the club, players, opposition fans and journalists, the book explores the social history of support, the culture, and the communalisation of fandom. It examines, through personal accounts, such phenomena as identity, loyalty, away support, hooliganism, communal chanting and singing, and the importance of location to the fan. The book also contains some published extracts, either from other books or newspapers, appertaining to the Kop.

The book inevitably concentrates on the post-war era (1946-1993). Potential interviewees for the pre-war period were, by then, approaching their eighties and more difficult to find as well as being less reliable as eye-witnesses. Nevertheless there are a number of interviews with individuals going back to the pre-war period. One interview even goes back as far as 1907. Since the book's publication in 1993 a number of those interviewed have died, making the book even more valuable as a source of material as it is now impossible to get interviews stretching as far back as was possible fifteen years ago.

In all, approximately 110 individuals were interviewed with 104 of these providing appropriate recordings for use. Interviews were carried out in a variety of places. Many of these participants provided lengthy interviews though others gave briefer accounts. Most of the interviews were recorded and some of the tapes for these interviews are now held in the archive of the FIFA National Football Museum at Preston (see later note on Methodology).

Some of the interviews were subsequently rejected because they either proved to be unreliable, were superfluous to the structure, repeated what had been more eloquently articulated by others or interviewees were simply incapable of articulating their memories in a manner that would not have necessitated major editing.

All of the interviews were carefully structured and chosen with some individuals more able to describe specific aspects than others. Originally published more than fourteen years ago, the book has now emerged as an even more important publication and piece of research as it deals with a period when standing at football grounds was both 'the norm' and permitted. That experience has now gone and there is little oral evidence remaining which recounts the experience. Subsequent oral history publications on football have dealt largely with the post-Taylor period.³

³ The Report of Lord Justice Taylor, following the Hillsborough Disaster of 1989 when 96 Liverpool fans were crushed at an FA Cup semi-final, made a number of recommendations that were to have a significant effect of spectatorship. In particular Lord Taylor recommended the introduction of all-seater stadia and also recommended changes in ticketing processes which meant that fans could no longer be admitted to games by paying at the turnstile, on the day, as they had in the past. This was to have a dramatic effect on fan

b) Kelly, S.F. (1999) Red Voices: An Oral History of Manchester United. London Headline.

This book is an oral history of fandom support for a particular football club, in this instance, Manchester United. Whereas The Kop concentrates on a specific area of terracing, this book tackles a wider perspective by exploring the general nature of fandom at a specific club. Through a series of interviews it examines the changing nature of fandom between 1920 and 1998.

The book was published as a hardback in February 1999 by the commercial publisher Headline. It was subsequently published as a paperback by the same publisher in 2000 with an updating chapter that included Manchester United's European Cup triumph of the 1998/99 season year and the winning of three trophies. Much of the new chapter was focused on the experiences of fans during the club's European triumph. Interviews for the original publication were conducted between 1996 and 1998. Interviews for the updated paperback version were carried out in 1999. A total of 70 individuals were interviewed for the original publication with 61 of the interviews retained. As with The Kop some interviewees were rejected for the same reasons.

All of the participants provided lengthy interviews. The interviews were carried out in the homes or offices of individuals and were recorded on minidisks and were subsequently transcribed. A handful of interviews were conducted via the telephone. The tapes for these interviews are now held in the archive of the FIFA National Football Museum at Preston. The interviewees ranged from the club chairman and directors, to players, fans and employees of the club. The interviews focused largely on the experience of individuals as fans.

Through these interviews the book highlights the cultural and social changes which have taken place in fandom since the 1920s. In particular it analyses such issues as the nature and meaning of fandom, the physical experience of fandom, and the social and technological influences on fandom between 1920 and 1990. It also examines in detail the emotional impact on fans of the Munich air disaster in 1958. Because it was published some years later than The Kop, it was able to assess some of the major changes that were taking place in fandom since the Taylor Report and the adoption of all-seater stadia.

Kelly, S.F. (1999) The Boot Room Boys. London, Collins Willow.

This is an oral history of a footballing community different to the ones previously listed. In this instance the community is not the public face of the club as seen through its supporters but the private face of the club, that is the backroom coaching staff. The study attempts to look at a different aspect of football culture by examining the contribution culture and is dealt with in more detail later. See Taylor (1990). Taylor, Rt Hon Lord Justice (1990) The Hillsborough Stadium Disaster 15 April 1989. Final Report Home Office, Cmnd 962. London, HMSO.

made to Liverpool Football Club by the coaching staff and management of the club. It also examines in detail the importance of their particular environment, widely and fondly known as the boot room. This was the venue, the workplace and the office for certain members of the coaching staff of the club. In essence it was simply a room where the players' boots were stored but over a period of time it also became the room where the coaching staff would gather to relax and where meetings would be held. With time it took on a mystical aura as much of the club's success was attributed to its personnel and operations. The study examines the mythology of this venue and considers whether there were any defining factors which helped influence the success of the club during the period or whether a simple myth has developed. It also examines this mythology through interview with many of those most closely engaged with the Boot Room to access their perception of the mythology against the reality.

The book also explores the relationship between those employed by the club – players, directors, coaches, managers – and the supporters. It examines a series of relationships, including those between the coaching staff, the relationship of the coaching staff to the fans, the relationship of the coaching staff to journalists, the relationship of the coaching staff to management and the relationship of players to the coaching staff.

Interviews for this book were carried out in 1998 and 1999. Like the other books this too was published by a commercial publisher, Collins Willow, in 1999. It was not subsequently published in paperback and has not since been republished in any other form.

Through an extensive series of interviews with spectators, players, coaches and others engaged with the game these three publications have drawn on memories which are now no longer a part of the general experience of today's spectators. As such we can begin to develop a flavour of the nature of fandom for previous generations. We can also detect factors which have evolved to change the subsequent profile of football fandom. Andy Ward and Rogan Taylor (Oral History, Spring 1997) urged historians not to forget the role of spectators in their analysis and argued that sport must be understood through a variety of relationships: player and player, spectator and player, father and son/daughter, spectator and rival spectator, player and coach, etc. In addition to these relationships, the relationship between manager/coaches and spectator is also important and was considered in one of the publications (The Boot Room Boys).

The three books also attempted to explain the importance of football to the makeup of a community through the constituent parts of its members. In the case of The Kop it was possible to examine, through interviews, the impact and relationship of a particular terracing to the larger community. By examining football fandom from three different perspectives – Liverpool fans, Manchester United fans and players and coaches – I have been able to assess whether the conditions at one locality have any commonality. In particular I asked whether fans at the two clubs had similar experiences and traditions or were their experiences unique to either of the clubs.

Finally, the books have explored the very nature of fandom and the importance of identity in the culture of the football fan. They have also examined whether this culture has changed and what factors prevail today that were absent generations ago.

Through these studies I have been able to address the concept of loyalty to a particular location and shown that individuals who meet regularly in a specific locality on terraces adopt a community identity and common rules. And that this applies to both Liverpool and Manchester United. I have also assessed how this identity expresses itself, and shown that it is done so through the use of wit and songs. I have also looked at whether this use of wit and song is spontaneous or pre-planned. My study detailed some of these songs for the first time, particularly at Anfield, to show how lyrics were adapted to express a mood or feeling in the common language of the community. I have also demonstrated the importance of local music, both popular and traditional, and its adaptation for specific purposes, particularly during the 1960s.

The publications also explore the ways in which individuals have been introduced to the terraces, at what age, and under what conditions and if attendance on this particular terracing acted as a rite of passage for young people into adult life. In addition, I have considered whether this facilitated the bonding processes within the family, particular between fathers and sons/daughters as well as between siblings.

I have also analysed the changing character of support and the effects that this has engendered, looking specifically at such things as crowd violence and have examined whether one particular terracing (the Kop) has any features common to other terracings in other stadia or whether it has characteristics peculiar to Liverpool.

Literature Review

The makeup of the footballing library falls into a number of categories. Prior to the 1980s the vast majority of book publications in Britain that focused on football were of a limited nature. Most publications were designed for a popular audience with few publications designed to challenge the reader or to provide any insights into the history and organization of the game.

Seddon (1999) detailed, for the first time, the literature devoted to the game and in particular detailed some of the earlier and rarer publications.⁴ The earliest known football publication is believed to be Beeton's Football (Wood, 1867) which was published just four years after the formation of the Football Association. This, now scarce text, had just 96 pages with numerous illustrations but offered few insights into the development of the game. Seven years later Football: Our Winter Game (Alcock, 1874) was the first truly comprehensive account of the growth of football, coming eleven years after the formation of the Football Association and some 14 years before the founding of the Football League. Its author Charles Alcock was to become an important administrator in the game, even suggesting the FA Cup competition, thereby lending his literary contribution some value to historians.

Although a number of other 'minor' publications on the game appeared during the latter years of the 19th century, it was not until 1906 that any volume of significance was published with the four-volumed Association Football and the Men Who Made It (Gibson & Pickford, 1906). This publication not only detailed the history of the game to date but also offered biographies of players and administrators that have proved of invaluable use to historians of the game. A handful of club histories followed during the 1920s and 1930s with Arsenal Football Club particularly active in producing annual handbooks. Most publications however tended to be short in content and certainly short on accurate information. Many popular newspapers also published soft-cover, season statistical books.

After the Second World War and with the growing popularity of football, a second and distinct genre was born with the advent of the book clubs. The Soccer Book Club was founded as an imprint of publishers Stanley Paul in order to provide popular publications to a growing market of more affluent and educated readers. Indeed it was part of an overall trend that saw numerous general book clubs entering the market, such as the Good Companions. Over the next decade the Soccer Book Club supplied cheap, hardback football books to a growing market. Most titles were generally player autobiographies but there were also a few coaching manuals, World Cup summaries, and the occasional, more serious history. Among the autobiographies were ones on Nat Lofthouse, Tom Finney, Stanley Matthews and Billy Wright. All of these 'autobiographies' were written by, or had substantial help, from practicing journalists and were to become known as 'ghosted' autobiographies. This is a practice that continues to this day and has become a genre within its own right.

⁴ For a detailed and thorough examination of the literature of football see Seddon, P. (1999) A Football Compendium. London, British Library.

One of the most notable of the brief histories was Football on Merseyside (Young, 1963) which tackled the early history of Liverpool, Everton and Tranmere Rovers Football Clubs. Young also produced Football: Facts and Fancies or the Art of Spectatorship (1950) as well as The Appreciation of Football (1951). Though short in length, both books offer some serious reflections on the nature of supporting a football club.

In contrast to the scarcity of serious football books at this time, there was a far richer library of quality cricketing titles, explained possibly by the educational background of players, readers and writers. These books tended to be detailed accounts of cricketing tours, Test Matches, and of course player autobiographies, again usually ghosted by a journalist. Genuine biographies did not appear on the market until the 1990s. No other sport offered any volume of publications of any note although boxing was often written about by respected writers, such as Norman Mailer, Bernard Shaw and Ernest Hemingway.⁵

This trend of ‘popular’ autobiographies and club histories continued until 1972 when the first genuinely ‘serious’ football publication The Glory Game (Davies, 1972) was published. This was an ‘inside’ account of the 1971/72 season at Tottenham Hotspur and proved highly successful. It has been reprinted on a number of occasions and remains a ‘classic’ in the genre. Only a Game (Dunphy, 1976) followed and provided a season’s diary from the player’s perspective, and was well regarded by the publishing and sporting communities. The ‘insider’ genre was to be short-lived as clubs and players soon realised the dangers of exposing themselves as the tabloid press headlined some of the more outrageous antics of footballers that had been detailed in the books.

The Soccer Tribe (Morris, 1981) was an early and innovative publication attempting to develop an anthropological analysis to football and to this day remains an important, though popular publication, into the serious nature of fandom. The book depicted football as a conflict between opposing tribes and many of the book’s assertions on ritual, fashion, colour and support, remain relevant to this day.

These publications broke with tradition and in doing so opened the way for an academic approach to examining the cultural phenomena of football. The People’s Game (Walvin, 1975), for the first time, seriously examined the social history of football in some detail. Tony Mason’s Association Football and English Society, 1863-1915 (1980) and Sport in Britain (1988) continued the trend of giving academic consideration to the role of sport and football in society. The term ‘fandom’ which had previously been applied to describe fans of science fiction, quickly became common currency for describing the unique activities of football fans. Although new ground had been broken by this more serious approach to examining football, it appealed only to a minority academic audience mainly of sociologists. Football books still remained a minority part of publishing.

⁵ See Mailer (1975) The Fight. Also Shaw (1979) Cashel Byron’s Profession.

The boom in football book publications did not however generally begin until the mid 1980s. My own book, You'll Never Walk Alone (Kelly, 1987), offered a popular approach to club history with a highly illustrated volume and 70,000 words of text. This was a hugely successful publishing venture that would sell more than 100,000 copies over the next ten years. My history of Liverpool was followed by a similar illustrated history of Everton Football, Forever Everton (1988). These two publications led to a plethora of similar studies on individual clubs that saw a boom in sports publishing.

But it was the phenomenal success of Nick Hornby's Fever Pitch (1992)⁶ which is sometimes classified as fiction rather than non-fiction, accompanied by the 'bourgeoisification' of football with its new audience during the 1990s, that was to lead to a growing market for serious football publications. Since then publications examining all aspects of football have been published as academics, serious journalists, and other writers of both non-fiction and fiction, have added significantly to the library of football publications. Fever Pitch would in itself initiate a new genre of football-supporting, fictional autobiographies.

Of the two clubs highlighted in my oral histories neither had a wealth of publications devoted to them prior to my own. The first recognised Liverpool publications did not come about until after the Second World War and were so limited as to be of little value. Young (1963, op cit) and Prole (1967) offered the first histories of the club although again, whilst interesting, merely sketched an outline of the club's formal history. There was nothing on fans or fan culture and the club did not even have a handbook until 1950. The same was largely true of Manchester United with the first written history of the club not appearing until 1926.⁷ Again there was nothing else until after the Second World War when the success of the club, particularly in the 1950s with the Busby Babes and the subsequent Munich Disaster, led to any textual interest. Even then it was sparse.

Another textual development came in the form of fanzines. The publication of informal and unofficial fan publications, which began in 1986 with When Saturday Comes, led quickly to a glut of such publications, attached to specific clubs⁸. This began a process where the fans' opinions became of increasing importance and opened up a new potential area of study. This democratisation of football, for the first time, gave a voice to fans. These publications became known as 'fanzines'.⁹

Apart from The Soccer Tribe (op. cit.) fandom was a generally neglected area of study prior to 1993. No other sport offered any such approach either. Once a more serious approach had become accepted, fandom became defined by academics as the cultural ⁶ Hornby's Fever Pitch sold over one million copies to make it the highest selling football book of all time. A highly successful full length feature film was also produced.

⁷ This publication was Souvenir of the International Match Played at Old Trafford, April 17th 1926 and History of Manchester United Football Club. Manchester, The Club. The author is unknown.

⁸ The first Liverpool fanzine, Through the Wind and Rain, was published in the spring of 1988. The first Manchester United fanzine, United We Stand began in 1989.

⁹ Fanzines were not however unique to football. The first fanzines appeared in the music industry. Among the first was Merseybeat, founded in July 1961.

characteristics of support, involving the experiences, traditions and activities of fans. Academics soon began to examine a range of features associated with support. Much of this however was carried out without reference or consultation with the fans themselves. My studies however, by employing oral interviews, have attempted to see fandom through the eyes of the fans themselves. As a consequence my studies have provided a new approach and in doing so have given fresh value to the growing volume of academic work as well as providing a different perspective.

Labour historians in the 1960s had seized up labour and trade unions as a rich area of unexploited study. In particular E. P. Thompson, Raphael Samuel, Christopher Hill and Eric Hobsbawm began to approach history from a new angle. Their approach became known as ‘history from below’ and focused on the lives of ‘ordinary’ people, rather than decision-makers. Raphael Samuel, with his History Workshops, encouraged working class students at Ruskin College to examine their own pasts and to draw upon their own rich experiences. Samuel was also one of the first historians in Britain to invoke the potential of recorded oral testimony in this arena.¹⁰

Oral history had first been adopted by George Ewart Evans in the early 1960s as well as by Raphael Samuel.¹¹ As interest grew in this approach over the next twenty years oral historians tended to concentrate on more traditional areas of exploration, such as work, war and communities. Leisure was, however, to become an increasing interest but sport was still largely ignored as a valuable area of oral research. The publication of my books, though, led to the development of a further genre with oral history examining various aspects of the game and its communities. In effect my publications have fused the study of sport with this fresh oral approach.

An editorial in Oral History, the journal of the Oral History Society, in 1997 commented that ‘this dearth of oral historical research is in part a reflection of the preoccupation of oral historians with radical protest, with working lives and family experience. Where memories of sport and leisure have cropped up in interviews, they have not been forefronted. Few major life stories have included sport as a topic worthy of much interest.’ (Oral History, Spring 1997).

The three publications dealt with here (The Kop, Red Voices and The Boot Room Boys) have been at the forefront of demonstrating that sport, and particularly through the use of oral testimony, is a potentially rich area for research. Each of the books, which use oral testimony as their basis, takes a different angle by exploring different footballing communities, thereby allowing us to acknowledge that sport can be best understood through a variety of relationships and perspectives. By compiling a series of lengthy interviews with more than 220 individuals of various ages, professions, backgrounds and ¹⁰ The History Workshops began at Ruskin College, Oxford under the tutelage of Raphael Samuel in 1968 and continued for many years.

¹¹ For examples of George Ewart Evans’ early work see Evans (1956) Ask the Fellow Who Cuts The Hay and George Ewart Evans (1970) Where Beards Wag All. Much of Evans’ work was focused on the declining agricultural industry and its accompanying way of life. The introduction of portable recording equipment in the early 1960s also opened the way for historians to conduct ‘field’ interviews and was to significantly lead to the development of oral history.

alignments, these publications offered a fresh and innovative approach to the increasing volume of football histories. In particular they have allowed us to witness sporting experience through immediate observations.

The editorial in Oral History argued that ‘sporting oral history is a new field...it has been argued that sports writing developed as a genre of its own, appropriate for its own audience. Perhaps oral history sports writing will be a similar departure. For now, surely more attention needs to be devoted to investigating why people participated in sport. How did sport relate to friendship and kinship networks, and to the relationship in the workplace?’ (Oral History, Spring 1997).

I believe that these texts do precisely that. In particular they detail a range of relationships, looking at how class, ethnicity and gender have played a role in football fandom. In doing so they suggest that football remained a largely male, working class, preoccupation until the 1990s when the compulsory introduction of the all-seater stadia encouraged the influx of the ‘new’, bourgeois fan. My interviews show that in many cases these new fans were middle class, female and from ethnic minorities. My work also examines the geographical and demographic nature of support, and whether the question of ‘identity’ is regarded as important by the fan, and if so, whether this importance transcends itself to inside the football stadium. In particular the texts trace how parliamentary legislation has impacted on the experience of football fandom, especially since the 1990s and how this has changed the experience of football spectating. The books also trace how transport developments have changed the nature and experience of attendance at games and whether any other significant technological developments have added to the game’s attraction. In addition the books question the impact of success on a local community and whether it increases the status of the city community within the wider nation.

The first edition of The Kop: The End of an Era (Kelly, 1993) was the first such publication to study a specific community of fans by using the technique of oral testimony to explore aspects of football history and culture. Since then others have explored football fandom through this method.¹² A variety of sports have also begun to adopt this technique, most notably cricket. A second football oral history, Red Voices (Kelly, 1999), took a wider view of a club’s fans, this time focusing on Manchester United, the most popular and most supported club in the land, and looking at fandom across all stadia localities, rather than one locality. A third oral history, The Boot Room Boys (Kelly, 1999), tackled a further perspective by concentrating on another community with the experiences of players, coaches, managers and administrators at Liverpool Football Club.

These three oral history books between them offer a thematic body of research into the historical and sociological experience of fandom, both as an innovative approach to the subject but also by providing a wide range of experience from a variety of perspectives. Together they offer a genuinely different insight into the social history of fandom, in this case, from the fans' perspective. Many of the interviews reflect on experiences as far back as the pre-war years and offer a rare and now almost impossible to re-create record of football fandom in the period. There are few if any, other recorded experiences by fans dating back as far as the 1920s or 1930s and there is little possibility of ever making such recording as fans grow older or die. Even a football fan in the 1930s will today be in his nineties.

¹² These include Taylor & Ward (1998) Three Sides of the Mersey; Watt (1993) The End and Taylor and Ward (1995) Kicking and Screaming.

In the time since their publication the books have been referred to by numerous academics and journalists. Indeed, a number of academics were interviewed for the books, including Dr John Williams, Director of the Centre for the Sociology of Sport at Leicester University, Dr Rogan Taylor of Liverpool University, Professor Roger Webster of Liverpool John Moores University, Dr John Doyle of Brighton University and the late Dr Derek Wynne, Director of the Institute for Popular Culture at Manchester Metropolitan University. Other notable interviewees include the late Lord Stan Orme, Graham Stringer MP, Steve Morgan, former chairman of Redrow Homes and chairman of Wolverhampton Wanderers Football Club and, Martin Edwards, former chairman of Manchester United FC. Numerous well-known players and officials of both clubs were also interviewed.

All three books have been commented upon and used as evidence in a number of publications. Jeff Hill, Director of the International Centre for Sports History and Culture, writing in Sport, Leisure and Culture in 20th Century Britain (2002) makes mention of The Kop. Passing Rhythms, Liverpool F.C. and the Transformation of Football (Williams, Hopkins & Long, 2001) contains frequent references to The Kop and to The Boot Room Boys. Simon Inglis (1996) also makes reference to The Kop in his highly acclaimed study of English football grounds as does Professor Dave Russell (1997). Professor Steve Redhead (1997) also makes reference to the book and its important use of oral history as a means of illustrating changes in the social history and fabric of the national game. The Boot Room Boys is referenced in Ghost on the Wall (Dohren, 2004). Red Voices is referenced in Jack and Bobby (McKinstry, 2002) and frequent references are made to the same book by the distinguished writer Jimmy Burns in When Beckham Went to Spain (2004).

A number of journalists writing in the national press have also heaped praise on the publications. On its publication The Kop was described by the doyen of sports writers Frank Keating in The Guardian (30.4.94) as 'a touching labour of love to preserve forever the legend.' A reviewer in The Independent (30.4.94) also called it 'commendable', while the Liverpool Daily Post (24.12.94) described it as 'a lament for an age that is about to pass into history'. The Kop is also acknowledged in Lives of the Great Songs (de Lisle, 1995).

Henry Winter, chief football correspondent of the Daily Telegraph and one of the country's most esteemed football writers, recently writing about The Kop, observed that these 'anecdotes of Anfield life have been brilliantly compiled.' He added that it was a 'fascinating tribute' (Daily Telegraph, 12.5.2005).

The author has been interviewed on BBC Radio, BBC Television, Granada Television, SKY Television and MUTV about the books as well as being interviewed by numerous newspapers and magazines. The author has also been interviewed on a number of occasions by researchers completing PhDs on the subject of fandom. In addition academic papers have been given to various conferences.¹³ The books have also proved to be of value in the writing of a number of other books by myself, in particular Bill Shankly: It's Much More Important Than That (1996), Dalglish (1992) and Fergie (1997).

The traditional attitude towards sporting history has changed in recent years as historians, and in particular oral historians, have widened their field of research and taken onboard the importance of leisure and sport in people's lives. The increasing popularity and the bourgeoisification or gentrification of football fandom since 1990 have also led to a growing interest in the history of the game and consequently a re-examination of sport as a cultural activity. The publication of The Kop and Red Voices have played some part in this change of attitude.

The theme of oral histories, focusing on football clubs, has since been added to by R. Taylor and A. Ward, Three Sides of the Mersey (1993), whose oral history of football on Merseyside interviewed fans and players of the three Merseyside clubs, Liverpool, Everton and Tranmere Rovers. It contained additional interviews with some of the individuals who I had interviewed and further explored a variety of issues, such as identity and rites of passage, which The Kop had initially raised. David Paul (1998) also produced an oral history of Liverpool Football Club some years later further examining some of these issues. In a subsequent publication Taylor and Ward, Kicking and Screaming (1995), produced a more general oral history covering English football, again developing many of the themes, such as rites of passage and ritual, that had emerged in my publications and which were now becoming rich territory for academics. In 1993 Taylor produced a deeply-moving oral history devoted to the Hillsborough disaster.

A further exponent of the oral history genre at this time was Tom Watt (1993) whose first work focused on Arsenal Football Club. Like Taylor and Ward, Watt mirrored many of the areas that I had initially explored in The Kop. Another publication by Watt (1995) was a more general study dealing with a variety of people active in the game, examining their occupations and functions within the game. The theme of oral history with fans voicing their own experiences of the nature of support focused around specific football clubs have since been published.

¹³ A summary of the work in this area was presented by the author as a paper to The Institute of Popular Culture at Manchester Metropolitan University in 1994. A further paper was given to the Representing Sport Conference at Liverpool John Moores University in May 2006 as well as at a research seminar at the University of Huddersfield in 2007. Papers have also been presented at the 5th annual conference of the Centre for Liverpool and Merseyside Studies in November 2008 and at the Sport and Oral History conference at the University of Huddersfield in April 2009. A further paper will be presented at the Oral History Society's annual conference in July 2009.

A published oral history of rugby league also appeared recently as well as one on professional golf.¹⁴ The University of Huddersfield's Centre for Oral History Research, under my own leadership, has been involved in a three-year research project collecting the oral memories of fans, administrators and players involved in rugby league.¹⁵ Again this project has used all three of my cited oral history publications as a template. Some of the themes that emerged in my football publications have similarly emerged in this study of rugby league and much concentration has been on the social history of spectatorship.

In the United States, a number of baseball and American Football teams have become the subject of oral histories¹⁶. Indeed American universities have pioneered much work connecting oral history and sport. The Oral History Society in Britain has also recognized this increasing area of study by devoting an entire issue of its quarterly publication *Oral History*¹⁷ to the subject of sport. Although the genre of sporting oral history has now become more commonplace, there still remains considerable scope for the study of sports other than football.

¹⁴ See McMillan (2004) and Barkow (2000)

¹⁵ Up and Under: An Oral History of Rugby League in West Yorkshire. See website www.rugbyleagueoralhistory.co.uk

¹⁶ For example, see Loverro (2007) and Royal & Wheat (2005)

¹⁷ See Oral History, Volume 25, no.1, Spring 1997, pages 40-74. The edition also contained articles on golf, athletics and rounders.

Thematic Review of the Current Academic Debates

As a result of a recent increased interest by academics in football as a serious area for study, various schools of thought have developed. In particular some of these focus on fandom. A number of distinct schools have emerged around social history, sociology, social anthropology, business and media.

Social historians have explored the birth and development of the game, relating it to other social developments in society, including legislation, the uniformity of rules, travel infrastructures, professionalism, gambling and so forth.¹⁸ This has also allowed historians to further examine other sports, such as cricket and rugby and to compare developments in those sports with football.¹⁹

Sociologists have examined a variety of inter-personal relationships within the game, many focused on fans and fandom. These include among others, crowd behaviour, alienation, hooliganism, social identity, gender, ethnicity, class, fashion and the consequences of the shift to all-seater stadia. In more recent years there has been considerable interest shown by business academics who have explored the influx of money into the game and its impact on the sport.²⁰ They have examined football as a business, looking particularly at such aspects as foreign ownership, business structures, the impact of ticket pricing, advertising and sponsorship. They have also looked at the mechanics of football as a business. More recently media influences on the game have attracted interest from media academics who have explored the relationship between football and its fans, and media organizations such as SKY Television²¹. They have also examined the celebrity cult of the football player in the tabloid press and the emergence 'new' writing.

My three oral history books have highlighted and initiated many of these themes for subsequent academic exploration. These include the social history of fandom, the nature of fandom, the make-up of fans, rituals, the use of song and chanting, fashion, identity and rites of passage. These books have provided some of the first oral evidence in these fields and have been taken up by social historians, sociologists and social anthropologists alike. And even where it has not been the first oral evidence it nevertheless has been valuable oral evidence that has added to the fabric and development of scholarly work.

For example, the issue of gender was raised by a number of respondents in both The Kop and Red Voices and this is a particularly important and relevant aspect of fandom. Liverpool fan Sheila Spiers talked about going on the Kop in the years immediately after the Second World War but admits that it was 'a totally male dominated area in those ¹⁸ See Taylor, M. (2008) The Association Game, A History of British Football and Walvin, J. (1975) The People's Game.

¹⁹ In particular see Hill, J. (2002) Sport, Leisure and Culture in 20th Century Britain; Birley, D. (1995) Land of Sport and Glory; and Mason, T. (1988) Sport In Britain.

²⁰ For examples see Conn, D. (1998) The Football Business; Garland, J. Malcolm, D. & Rowe, M. (2003) The Future of Football.

²¹ See Boyle, R. & Haynes, R. (2004) Football in the New Media Age.

days' and that when she was in the boys' pen she was 'the only girl there'. She does however admit that nonetheless 'all the other boys accepted her' (The Kop, p.23).

This response was echoed by a number of other women and men in the books, particularly about female attendance prior to the Second World War. Liz Crolley and Cathy Long in Williams, Hopkins and Long (2001) however, suggest that contrary to speculation it was not uncommon for women to attend football matches in the 1940s and 1950s and the authors cite evidence from a number of women who attended matches at this time. Fishwick (1989) also claims that 'contingents...of women and middle class supporters' existed during the inter-war period.

Although there may be some oral and photographic evidence to support these claims about the late 1940s and 1950s, it is dangerous to make too substantive a judgment from the evidence available. There does however seem to be even less evidence to support any claim about female football attendance prior to the Second World War. The likelihood is that while there may be examples of women attending football matches before the 1960s, oral histories have not examined this proposition in any detail. Only further photographic evidence from newspaper archives and a far more detailed study focused on this issue would be able to deal more adequately with the question of gender attendance at football. Given that no attendance surveys were conducted in earlier years, we may never know the full extent of female attendance at Anfield or Old Trafford prior to the Second World War.

The same is true when it comes to examining the general makeup of the football audience. Some of those interviewed talked about the changing makeup of fans in more recent years as football has become more bourgeoisified. The assumption is that higher prices, new ticketing arrangements, executive boxes, family stands, banqueting suites and so forth have attracted a new clientele into football and that it is more affluent than it was ten years and more ago. Others though, such as Derek Wynne²² in Red Voices (p.252), deny this and reflect that the make-up of those supporters sitting near them has not changed and is remains largely working class. This view was echoed in the late 1990s. Much subsequent analysis and evidence has been produced and ten years later this is an issue which still causes some debate among academics²³. Surveys conducted at numerous clubs have identified the changing make-up of fans although many clubs, particularly in the lower leagues and in certain regional areas, still attract a substantial working class audience.

Mellor (1999) in his study of the make-up of fans during the 1950s and 60s suggests that the building of car parks in the vicinity of, and alongside football grounds, with subsequent photographic evidence of them being crammed with vehicles prior to the games, offers some evidence of a sizable middle-class audience. This view is also echoed by a number of testimonies in The Kop with respondents, such as Harry Wilson talking about the ‘toffs’ who sit in the stands (p.16). Given the price of admission to the stands it is likely that only the better paid, more professional workers could afford entry. Taylor (2008) also examines the changing nature of football fandom, citing such things as the influx of money into the game through television deals, the emergence of a literature surrounding the game, seating and a heightened media interest, as factors which have encouraged the growth of a middle class audience.

²² The late Derek Wynne was himself a writer on football and Director of the Institute for Popular Culture at Manchester Metropolitan University

²³ See Mellor, G. (1998) The Social and Geographic Make-up of Football Fans in the North West of England, in The Sports Historian, Vol 19, No 2.

Another aspect of fandom taken up in my books is that of local identity. There are many interviewees who talk about supporting Liverpool one week and Everton the next week prior to the 1960s. This is however not just common to Merseyside. Manchester United fans talked also of supporting United one week and Manchester City the following week, particularly when Manchester United were playing at Maine Road immediately after the war following bomb damage at Old Trafford²⁴. This argument also does not appear to be confined to the locked localities of Liverpool and Manchester. In developing this theme Mellor (1999) suggests that it was not uncommon in other localities for football fans to support two clubs. His study argues that in the north west of England where there was a preponderance of professional football clubs, it was not uncommon, during the 1940s and 1950s for fans to travel the short distances around Lancashire to attend football matches.

In his study of the changing pattern of support and the transformation of English football in the 1990s, King (2002), has examined in particular this changing culture of fandom. He has relied upon a similar interviewing pattern as I have in my books with the difference that he has taken a much smaller group of supporters (about 20) and regularly interviewed them in order to ascertain changes in their attitude, style and approach to supporting. Indeed three of the 20 people he has focused on were initially interviewed by myself for Red Voices.

King describes the transformed model fan that he finds as the ‘new consumer fan’ and argues that the emergence of this signifies an end to many of the traditions and rites of passage that were associated with the past. The new fan is more demanding, more of a consumer than a blind follower. The traditional fan still exists among the ‘lad’ culture but it is the new fan – more wealthy, more consumerist and more professional - who has become the more attractive fan for the clubs themselves in the new financial climate of football administration. And it is to these fans that the clubs have made most overtures and concessions. This has led to a division among fans at some clubs with one set of fans (‘the lads’) claiming to be the true heirs of the club whilst the consumerist fans provide the financial being of the club. The roots of this debate can be detected in both The Kop and Red Voices.

The issue of all-seater stadia and its impact on spectatorship and fan culture is of crucial importance and is raised on numerous occasions in The Kop and Red Voices. Indeed the updating of both books deliberately focused on this aspect. Many fans in The Kop and Red Voices argued that whilst they could fully understand the inevitability of all-seater stadia following the disaster at Hillsborough, it unfortunately had instigated a marked change in fandom. Fans felt that seating muted the passion of the crowd with less singing and chanting. There were also concerns that the makeup of the crowd was shifting with its traditional working class make-up less in evidence and that football was becoming more 'middle class'. Ticket prices, and the complexities in buying tickets beforehand, have also alienated the traditional fan who liked to make a spontaneous decision about attendance.

²⁴ Old Trafford was bombed on 11th March 1941 with the grandstand and part of the pitch suffering heavy damage. As a result United played at Maine Road for a number of seasons until the damage had been repaired.

All these issues, which are expressed in my oral histories, are taken up by King (2002) who analyses the transformation of football in the 1990s and the end of terrace culture. King argues also that it reflects similar transformations taking place across British society.

King also points out that the emergence of new football writing, spearheaded by Nick Hornby and myself, has provided football with a new audience; middle class, professional and educated. Taylor (2008) also lends considerable credence to this discussion. The emergence of fanzines has also indicated a more demanding audience, not prepared to accept what they regard as club propaganda or national and local newspaper epiphets. Indeed, football has now become 'above ground'; accepted, academic and a popular talking point within society that transcends gender and class. Compared to 15 years ago, following the Heysel disaster when it went 'underground', this has been a seismic shift.

Football has changed however not just in the make-up of fans but also in its on-field management. The changing role of the football manager is highlighted in The Boot Room Boys and this theme is taken up by Neil Carter (2006). The Boot Room Boys details the operations of another footballing community, in this case the back room staff at Anfield with the role of the Boot Room and Bill Shankly being seen as crucial not only in the success of Liverpool Football Club but also in the development of the modern manager and the infrastructure now surrounding the position. Carter explores the historical context of these changes from the anonymous, amateurish manager of Nineteenth century football to the well-paid, motivational, television manager of recent years and finally to what he describes as the postmodern manager of today. This he describes as a manager versed as much in business techniques, psychological skills and a knowledge of the world game as in the traditional portfolio of management skills. Shankly is seen as one of the first motivational managers whose successes helped spearhead many changes in football management, particularly in modernising the role and giving the manager a 'public' voice. Shankly's style of management and the techniques he used are detailed in The Room Boys through a range of interviews with those who were most closely associated with him.

In particular we can discern from the oral testimony the importance and increasing influence of the boot room community in running the affairs of the club on the pitch. Shankly also helped, perhaps unconsciously, to develop the role of the football manager into that of media manager, even at times manipulating the press to his own ends. Shankly also became heavily involved in choosing which players were to be signed, something which has not been common place with previous managers. Shankly also deliberately fostered a relationship with the fans and crowd thereby unwittingly ensuring his own security.

Nevertheless, it was to be Shankly's work with the boot room staff that was to be his principal legacy. Each member of the staff had a particular role to play; Shankly was the leader and motivator, Bob Paisley was the tactical expert, Ronnie Moran was the disciplinarian while Joe Fagan acted as the link with the players. Subsequently, as one manager retired, each member of the boot room stepped up the promotional ladder with a new person usually being added to the staff at the lowest rung. This familiar style was to suit Liverpool well up until 1985 when they broke with tradition by appointing a manager outside of the boot room.

The Boot Room Boys covers the period 1960 to 1999 and thereby examines not only this ongoing system but also maps the crucial years of change. In particular it identifies the importance of Shankly and his period at Liverpool when, under his leadership, a second division side was transformed into the championship-winning side of later years. Indeed, it underlines the crucial role played by Shankly in the subsequent success of Liverpool Football Club in the modern era. The Shankly legacy was to establish a structure that would serve the club successfully for the next 25 years until 1985 when player Kenny Dalglish was appointed player manager. The appointment of Dalglish broke with this lineage and came as something of a surprise to many Liverpool followers. Dalglish however would merely tinker with the Liverpool style of management although when he did make changes, such as the sacking of chief scout Geoff Twentyman and trainer Chris Lawler, it caused considerable comment within the wider community of Liverpool Football Club. Dalglish's continuing successes on the pitch, though, eclipsed any criticisms.²⁵

It was not until Dalglish retired through ill-health in 1991 and another former Liverpool captain, Graeme Souness, was appointed manager that any significant changes were to be made to the systems and structures that were in place. Again the appointment of Souness did not follow in the traditions of boot room promotion. Souness, who had initiated revolutionary changes in his previous position as manager of Glasgow Rangers, took further radical measures at Liverpool, including changes in training, diet, staffing and structures at the club. New appointments were made in staff to the boot room when he appointed his assistant at Rangers Phil Boersma as trainer. The boot room was also to be demolished as too was the Kop although both these measures were taken as a result of external factors. The appointment of Souness also underlined the shift to a new era of the 'television' manager.²⁶

Following the departure of Souness in 1998 a further shift took place with the appointment of the Frenchman Gerard Houllier as joint manager with Roy Evans. This was considered extraordinary in the Liverpool tradition, the club never having had joint managers in its long history and nor a foreign manager. The joint management structure was not however a situation that was to last very long and by November 1998 Houllier had been appointed as sole manager.²⁷ This shift is described by Carter (2006) as the move to the 'postmodern manager'. Again this development is identified in The Boot Room Boys including oral testimony from Houllier himself, as well as Roy Evans, outlining the changes that he implemented. The move towards a European manager was mirrored at other clubs as well, including Arsenal, Chelsea and Tottenham Hotspur.

²⁵ For more details on Dalglish's role with Liverpool Football Club see Kelly (1992)

²⁶ Information on Graeme Souness' period as manager at Glasgow Rangers and Liverpool is detailed in Kelly (1994).

This changing shift in the modern game is examined in detail by Morrow (2003) when he asks whether football clubs are businesses or social institutions. The Liverpool model had always been that the club was a social institution with its roots deeply embedded in the local community. Nonetheless, the club's success in the 1980s widened its appeal not only throughout the length and breadth of Britain but in Europe and the Far East so that the club is now a global enterprise operating in an international sports commercial market.

Manchester United similarly have widened their base support in more recent years due to their ongoing success so that today they too are a global brand. Inevitably the influx of money into football, via a stream of television and sponsorship deals, has changed the relationship between fan and club. Other increasing revenues, through larger stadia and attendance, sales of merchandise and sponsorship have also sustained the challenge for success. But perhaps more importantly in recent years is that the influx of foreign managers has been followed by an influx of foreign owners. Both Manchester United and Liverpool are currently owned by American businessmen. The postmodernist manager has been superseded by the postmodernist global club. Inevitably this has led to the alienation of fans, particularly those who attend matches. The new culture of the TV fan has grown with fans owning and wearing the kit of their favourite club but never actually attending games. Whilst this might be developing phenomena in the UK it is a common occurrence in the United States where many NFL fans are unable to support their team due to the unavailability of tickets, travel costs and ticket costs themselves, plus the fact that there are so few NFL teams operating in the major leagues.

Williams, Hopkins and Long (2001) also rely heavily on my research and oral testimony as their study develops an overall examination of the history and other relevant aspects of Liverpool Football Club. Their study uses much of the oral testimony from The Boot Room Boys, placing it in context and comparing it with wider developments in the English game. In doing so, they provide a framework that uses Liverpool Football Club as a means of understanding enhancements elsewhere. In particular they see the boot room as a developed structure being copied and implemented at other clubs though rarely with much success. Indeed it was often the case that former Liverpool players moving into management attempted to transfer the structures, ideology and techniques of the boot room to their new abodes. Again however it resulted in little or no success.

Williams, Hopkins and Long (2001) also examine fan culture at Liverpool, and in particular the Kop, which they perceive as a dynamic force in the success of the club, and note the changes in fan culture that have taken place since the Second World War. In particular they highlight Hillsborough as having a major impact on fan culture with its emotional responses as well as the architectural changes forced on it through the Taylor Report. Citing my various studies they also examine racism, gender, fashion and hooliganism at Liverpool as well as the impact of the club's modern global appeal on fandom.

²⁷ For further information on Gerard Houllier, see Kelly (2003)

Like King (2002), Professor Steve Redhead (1997) has also highlighted the development of football writing and the new media and its importance to the bourgeoisification of spectatorship. He cites my own contributions towards this development of the study of bourgeoisification. Redhead describes this as a connective culture between music, writing, fashion and media and refers to it as post-fandom. Redhead has previously argued that there was a crossover between popular music, youth culture and football.

The link between football and music can be traced back to the early 1960s and the singing culture that emerged on the Kop which is detailed in The Kop. Redhead acknowledges this link and makes the point that many subsequent Liverpool-based bands, such as The Farm, and later the Zutons, have established their credibility by being linked with Liverpool Football Club and its culture. As a consequence there has long been a link between football fandom and music in the city of Liverpool and extending from this culture is a further wider link to 'laddishness' and hooliganism. Connected into this also is fashion which is outlined in the oral testimony contained in The Kop.

Redhead takes as his starting point the notion that football prior to the Millennium was an identity-forming aspect of adolescence. Young men, and he stresses that it was predominantly male, adopted the culture of their fathers/brothers/uncles/ grandfathers as they pursued a rites of passage in football attendance. Much of this was trumpeted in my own studies of The Kop and Red Voices. Redhead however believes that this youth culture is being reshaped and argues that the disappearance of terraces does not necessarily indicate an end to the terrace culture. Rather, he says, the post-fan soccer culture is simply changing and adapting, not disappearing and has now been reshaped by a youth culture heavily influenced by globalization and mediatisation.

Both Red Voices and The Boot Room Boys, however, examine footballing communities other than fans or backroom staff. In the case of both these books interviews have been recorded with administrators and officials of Manchester United and Liverpool. In the case of Liverpool interviews were carried out with Rick Parry, the current Chief Executive; Peter Robinson, the former Chief Executive; and Tom Saunders, a former director. At Manchester United interviews were conducted with Martin Edwards, the former owner and Chief Executive Officer; Danny McGregor, the Commercial Director; Les Olive the former Club Secretary; and Sir Bobby Charlton, the former player and now club director. These interviews provided a different perspective from that of the ordinary fan, allowing for an examination of the way both clubs operate on a business level, rather than a footballing level. Bose (2007) and Andrews (2004) have also examined the commercial development of United and subsequent business model.

The phenomenal success of Manchester United, both on and off the pitch, is examined in detail in Red Voices. In particular the interview with Martin Edwards reveals the importance of the club's decision to become a publicly quoted company on the stock exchange. His evidence is also supported by other important personnel at Old Trafford.

The decision to float on the stock exchange was part of a business plan to raise capital. It allowed fans and investor institutions to purchase shares in the club, thereby extending its capitalization base. The money raised from the flotation was used primarily for the reconstruction of Old Trafford as it was transformed into an all-seater stadium to comply with the recommendations of the Taylor Report. Further ground developments at a later stage brought about rapid increases in capacity and thus ensured more revenue through the turnstiles. As part of the continuing commercial plan the number of executive boxes and executive areas were also increased and guaranteed further revenue earning. In turn the increases in revenue allowed for the purchase of top quality, expensive players in the transfer market.

While the business plan brought in significant revenues, it was equally important to ensure that there was success on the pitch. This was achieved by allocating a substantial proportion of the budget to signing top quality players. In turn success on the pitch would lead to continuing commercial successes off the pitch and guaranteed a demand for tickets. Of course, failure on the pitch might well have endangered this plan but the ability to compete for players at the highest level and to be able to outbid other clubs in the transfer market at least meant that there was a strong possibility of success on the pitch. All these factors were to prove crucial, as is recognized in Mellor (Summer 2002) as well as Andrews (2004).

Mellor (2000) has examined the reasons behind United's emergence as a national and international super-club, looking particularly at the legendary status that was afforded United following the Munich disaster. Mellor concludes however that the club's success and popularity is due more to careful economic and business planning than to the mythical status afforded by the Munich disaster. He argues that this coupled with the growing popularity of the club in the 1960s, when it became the first English club to win the European Cup, boasting exciting players such as Denis Law, George Best and Bobby Charlton, has underpinned its rise to become one of the most important clubs in world football. In Red Voices numerous interviewees also talk of the club's rising popularity in the 1960s and its importance. For many fans this was their initiation into supporting United. With the club's current status founded on the 'romance' associated with the club during this period, Manchester United have been able to go from strength to strength.

It is clear however from the interviews with Rick Parry and Peter Robinson in The Boot Room Boys that Liverpool have shied from adopting a similar model. Whilst Liverpool enjoyed phenomenal success in the 1970s and 1980s there was a reluctance to exploit this success commercially, preferring instead to be seen as doing things the 'Liverpool way' rather than as a major commercial enterprise. This decision would have later repercussions.

Both The Kop and Red Voices raise a number of complex societal issues that have faced football fans, administrators and authorities. One of these is hooliganism. The books however do not try to analyse or moralise about this problem but rather prefer to allow the fans to voice their own experiences in an open manner. In some cases this does not make for comfortable reading. Hooliganism is an issue which has since become a major preoccupation with sociologists and criminologists, producing a plethora of publications and analyses. Taylor (2002) for instance argues that it is a societal problem as much as it is a 'football' problem. The onus therefore is on society to resolve some of the issues rather than to place the burden on footballing authorities, police, clubs and fans. Others such as Redhead (1991) pinpoint a contradiction for fans between a need for greater identification with an increase in alienation resulting from unemployment and other social problems during the 1970s and 1980s. King (2002) points to the commoditisation and commercialisation of football alienating the conventional fan from the terraces and working class communities where football traditionally operated and thrived. Stephen Wagg (2004) also raises this concern.

Another issue dealt with in my books which has since been at the forefront of concerns facing football administrators and authorities, is the problem of racism. Again this is an issue which has been taken up and examined by sociologists and historians alike with Guilianotti (2005), for instance, arguing that racism in sport cannot be viewed as peculiar to any singular sport or group of individuals but instead has to be analysed through wider social structures and cultural practices. It is, he points out, fundamentally a societal and cultural problem. A series of interviews in both The Kop and Red Voices attempted to examine the issue through interviews with black football fans who related their terrace experiences when confronted with racists chanting and abuse. In particular one black fan of Manchester United talks of how he and his friends reacted to continued abuse by meeting it with violence. Others studies, such as King (2004) and Moran (in Garland, 2003), have also examined race from a black perspective and have concluded that racism is broader than unwitting prejudice but is inherent and institutionalized as much in society as it is in sport.

My own biography of Kenny Dalglish (1992) also examines the signing of the black player John Barnes and the controversy that followed. Barnes, was only the second black player to have played for Liverpool but, unlike his predecessor, he was a high-profile signing, joining the club for a record fee. His arrival was greeted by racist daubing on the walls at Anfield and a significant amount of racist abuse from the crowd during his early games. These incidents are also detailed in Hill (1989).

Many of these themes have also been developed in my other publications, most notably my biographies. In Fergie: the Biography of Alex Ferguson (1997), there is considerable reference given to the changing nature of Manchester United Football Club and its development as a global commercial enterprise. Two of my other publications, Dalglish (1992) and Souness: A Soccer Revolutionary (1994) deal with the changing nature of management at Liverpool Football Club as well as detailing the history of the club during the period 1977-1992. My history of Liverpool Football Club, You'll Never Walk Alone (1987) also examines in more detail the history of the club since its inception in 1892.

The question of authenticity and the reliability of memory is one which constantly exercises the minds of all historians but none more so than oral historians, all of whose work is associated with memory and the articulation of recall. It is certainly reasonable to claim that memory sometimes mythologizes vagueness into accuracy and reality. The oral historian must always be aware of this. Nonetheless, it should not impede the efforts of the oral historian, nor denigrate their work and its value.

At a recent conference (Remembering War, Wellcome Collection, London, 31.1.2009) Dr Martin Conway, Director of the Institute of Psychological Sciences at the University of Leeds and a leading authority on autobiographical memory argued that what was important with memory was the overall impression. He believed that while there may be elements within the particular memory which may not be accurate, it was the overall impression or emotion that was of utmost importance, thereby making the recollection credible. He further argued that it was no less plausible as evidence as many other aspects of historical research, including textual and visual material. It may not be an accurate reflection but it is a representation of experience. Analyses carried out by Dr Conway have shown that while memory may not always be accurate it can nonetheless be a true reflection of experience. And this is primarily what oral historians are attempting to achieve.

Oral historians would add that much of their work anyhow is focused on impression and emotion rather than dealing with 'defined' factual evidence. And this is especially so in the case of my own work. My books are not so much focused on the historical facts surrounding football fandom but rather on the 'experience' and the emotion attached to it. In my work I have corrected factual inaccuracies where they have been relevant (see later note) but my work is not essentially about historical facts but rather about the impressions and emotions attached to the activity of football supporting.

The Submission

The clubs, Liverpool Football Club and Manchester United Football Club, were deliberately chosen because they rank as the most successful and best supported clubs in English football. Whilst the study of Manchester United, Red Voices, is a wider examination of the social history and culture of football at Old Trafford, the two books on Liverpool focus on two separate communities. One is the Kop which is the area occupied by the most fervent of Liverpool fans and as such is a history of fandom on this particular terracing. The other book, The Boot Room Boys, focuses on the coaching staff at Liverpool who took up residence in the club's boot room. Following the phenomenal success of the club during the period 1960-1985, this room became something of a myth in footballing circles as it was regarded as the operational headquarters for this success.

This standing terrace, known as the Spion Kop, was constructed in 1906 and demolished in 1994. It was originally built as a reward to Liverpool fans for their support during the 1905/06 season when Liverpool had won their second league championship. At the time of construction it was the largest single terracing in British football and remained so until its demolition in the summer of 1994. The terracing stood behind the goal, adjacent to the Walton Breck Road. When it was first built it was capable of holding around 20,000 people. The book's introduction details the design and construction of the Kop. It was called Spion Kop after a hill in Natal in South Africa which had been the centre of a particularly bloody conflict during the Boer War. In January 1902 the battle of Spion Kop resulted in the loss of life of hundreds of British soldiers. Many of these soldiers belonged to Liverpool and Lancashire regiments. It was suggested by the then Sports Editor of the Liverpool Echo, Edward Edwards, that Spion Kop would be an appropriate name for the newly constructed terracing and would be a fitting memorial to the many Liverpool soldiers who had died and who might have been supporters of Liverpool Football Club (The Kop, p. 9). In 1928 the Kop was enlarged with a roof erected on it so that it could hold around 27,000 fans. Again, its design and construction are detailed in the Introduction to The Kop.

By drawing on a wide range of personal experiences, many going back to before the First World War, it is possible to gauge the importance of the Kop as a status symbol for Liverpool fans throughout a lengthy period of time. The Kop became of increasing importance during the 1960s with the emergence of a popular music culture in Liverpool. This was reflected on the Kop by the fans' own practice of singing songs of particular popularity at that given time. Mostly these songs reflected the fame and popularity which Liverpool music groups had assumed.

The closure of the Kop at the conclusion of the 1993/94 season provided a fitting moment for reflection on its significance within the community. Given that the experience of standing on terraces is no longer permitted in Premiership football, the study has taken on even more importance as the comments and observations by fans are now unique and gradually becoming unobtainable. Likewise, the experiences recorded in Red Voices, provide a cross reference of accumulated memories which provide a unique insight into football fandom at two of the largest football clubs in Britain.

Through a series of interviews with managers, coaches, directors and administrators of Liverpool Football Club, detailed in The Boot Room Boys, we are able to track some of the off- field changes which have taken place in English football over the years. Many of these interviews have now become unique as the interviewees have since died. As such their memories have become of increasing importance in the study of spectatorship and footballing history.

The gathering of a wealth of oral testimony, backed by extensive research in more traditional written sources, has allowed the reader to reconsider the history of football spectatorship and management in the twentieth century. Not only does it highlight the social history of spectatorship but it also encourages a new perspective, based on of the individual experience. This can also include emotional responses to spectatorship. In doing so this has had the effect of fleshing out the history of football, enabling it to break free from the traditional perspective of events on the pitch towards the inter-relationship between sport and everyday life.

The Pre-1960s Experience of Fandom: People's Fandom

The experience of football fandom before the Second World War was a far different experience to the one of today. Before the war it was a case of standing for most fans, often on packed and uncomfortable terraces. Only the wealthy could afford the few seats that were available in the grandstands. Although both Liverpool and Manchester United had covered terraces, most football clubs did not, thereby subjecting their occupants to the vagaries of the weather.

Admission was cheap but this tended to be reflected in the facilities and conditions. Toilet facilities were usually non-existent, inadequate or difficult to reach, especially if it meant squeezing one's way past tens of thousands of spectators. At Liverpool this led to fans resorting to urinating where they stood (The Kop p. 11). Food was restricted to tea, hot Bovril and little else. And there were inherent dangers in the swaying masses on the Kop or Stretford End.

Transport was also a problem, often too costly for the average man, who ended up having to resort to either walking or cycling. Transport improvements have always played a major function in encouraging the development of the game. An improved railways structure between 1860 and 1890 made travel easier and helped encourage the development of local, then regional and later national league systems. Not only did travel become easier for teams to travel further distances but fans also were able to take advantage and follow their teams, albeit in small numbers initially.

Before the Second World War, it was not uncommon for fans to walk vast distances to follow their teams (Red Voices, p. 22). One interviewee records how he once walked from Salford to Bolton to see Manchester United and then walked back to Salford after the game (ibid.). Another recalls how he would regularly walk from Bootle to Anfield, a distance of five miles or so, most Saturdays, and then walk the same distance back (The Kop, p. 16). Many also travelled by bicycle and offering lockup sheds was a popular way for those who lived close to the ground to earn some extra money (The Kop, p. 19).

The cost and difficulty of travelling to away matches generally meant that few fans travelled in support of their team to away grounds, making the home ground an even more important focus for support. Many fans also worked a half day on a Saturday so that travelling to away grounds was out of the question. Nevertheless, it was not totally unknown prior to the Second World War. For some it offered their first ever experience of travel. Stan Orme (Red Voices, p. 12) saw miners for the first time when he followed Manchester United to Barnsley. This was to have a profound effect on him and his future career.²⁸

Another notable point to emerge from the oral evidence is that in both the cases of Manchester and Liverpool football it was not uncommon for fans to support both clubs within their city. After the war and well into the 1950s, Manchester United fans would support their team at Old Trafford one week, and then Manchester City at Maine Road the following week²⁹ (Red Voices, p. 32). This would suggest that there was a less formalised system of fandom. This practice however was to die out in the later 1960s as football became more competitive and especially when violence at football grounds began to emerge. And with it fandom would become more formalized. Increasing social and geographical mobility would also in time change the nature of fandom.

²⁸ Stan Orme, later became the Labour MP for Salford West and a distinguished Cabinet Minister.

Although football spectating may have been an uncomfortable business there were unforeseen benefits. Prior to 1960, and the reconstruction of many stadia, it was possible to walk from one part of the ground to another (The Kop, p. 18). Safety measures and ground rebuilding would later make this opportunity impossible. As a result it was common for fans to move from behind one goal to the other end of the ground at half time. This practice led to greater overcrowding on the Kop when the team were playing towards the Kop, usually in the second half (ibid.). This was a practice experienced at other grounds although the architecture of some grounds did not always allow for this movement of fans.

Prior to the Second World War, and indeed at some grounds even well into the 1950s, it was common practice to open the gates at three-quarter time. This was in order to let people out of the ground early but it always led to a rush of spectators coming into the ground, usually youngsters who could not afford to pay an entrance fee (Red Voices, p.20). During the 1930s, many fans would walk to the ground, wait until three-quarter time and then go in to see the final 20 minutes or so. That way they went to see a football match without having to pay.

The vast majority of fans at both Liverpool and Manchester United were working class (The Kop, p. 16). It was also the case that many players often lived in the same communities as the fans and it was not uncommon to spot players travelling via public transport, usually a bus, going to the same game (Red Voices, p. 62). This was primarily because players were paid little more than the average wage in the community and as consequence they lived in properties and areas similar to those of the fans. This led to a more direct relationship with players. Likewise, for the players their experience of the game was not dissimilar from that of the fans (The Boot Room Boys, p. 52). Many players had also supported their team from the same vantage point as the fans when they had been younger and as a consequence they understood the passion, identity, loyalty and dedication of those fans (The Kop, p. 33). Players also tended to play for their own local side and there were certainly no foreign players in the team, apart from the occasional Scot, Irish or Welshman.

Apart from Cup finals, semi-finals and some internationals, it was not until after 1945 that fans began to travel to away games in significant numbers. During the 1950s transport improvements, and the introduction of the five-day week in many occupations, offered greater opportunities for travelling support. British Rail football specials became a common feature along with cheap coach trips to away games (Red Voices, p. 114). Car ownership later encouraged further possibilities for travel, especially as travel costs could be shared between the four or five occupants. This was especially the case with Manchester United fans as their team was enjoying an unprecedented run of success. Liverpool's failure to reach the top division until 1962 stunted opportunities for away travel with fans reluctant to make long journeys in support of a team that was struggling to escape the second division or to see less attractive opposition.³⁰ One of the few occasions when Liverpool fans did travel to see their side was for the 1950 FA Cup semi-final and later final when they faced Arsenal at Wembley (The Kop, p.135).

²⁹ It was the same situation in Liverpool where many Liverpool fans supported Everton one week and Liverpool the next.

Travelling to away games would eventually have a major impact on fandom, leading to increases in fanaticism, hooliganism and segregation in grounds. This is detailed at a later point.

Large terracings, such as the Kop and the Stretford End, nevertheless remained, throughout their existence, the preserve of less affluent supporters; the cost of entry being far lower for these areas than for any other part of the ground, particularly the seating areas. Prices for the stands were three or four times the cost of standing, and much of the seated area was preserved for season ticket holders who had to pay in advance for their season ticket. Costs therefore played a significant part in preserving these localities for the working man.³¹ Similarly the stands with seating remained the preserve of the more wealthy.

Within these large localities, many smaller sub-localities existed. The emergence of such sub-localities or communities on the Kop led to a number of peripheral footballing activities. During the 1950s, before the introduction of legalised gambling, informal betting was a major communal activity. Before kick-off fans would pay a small wager and would draw 20 numbers from a hat which was passed around the community. The winning ticket was the shirt number of the first goalscorer (The Kop, pp. 11, 12). It was also the same at Old Trafford (Red Voices, p. 16). Interestingly, this activity is today a legalised and highly popular form of betting at football matches.

The Boys' Pen which was an area on the Kop, designated for the sole use of youngsters, was another significant community. The area was penned off from the rest of the Kop and was for the restricted use of those under sixteen. It was also cheaper. Similar exclusive areas existed at most football clubs. Prior to the 1950s it had been located in the Kemlyn Road terracing (The Kop, p. 17). It was regarded as a 'safe' area and locating in this locality was seen as part of the ritual of the football fandom apprenticeship. Older fans standing on the fringes of the Boys' Pen would maintain a watchful eye on the locality and intervene if problems emerged. Equally however, it was seen as distinctly non-adult to continue locating in this area as one grew older. And within this community activities such as the swapping of football programmes, autographs, comics and so forth was a common activity.

³⁰ Liverpool had been League champions in the first season after the war, 1946/47 but were then relegated in 1954 after a number of dispiriting seasons.

³¹ In September 1932 unemployment in Liverpool stood at 31 per cent (Ministry of Labour Gazette, 1932 HMSO). In some areas of the city and in certain trades the level of unemployment was considerably higher, making the cost of watching football particularly high for many of the club's traditional supporters. When unemployment again reached new heights in the 1980s, the club had to be mindful of their constituent's financial status. As a result the unemployed were admitted to matches at a cheaper rate while season tickets were held at an affordable price.

An aspect of football fandom, often ignored by social historians, is that mid-week matches were always played during the afternoon, and in winter kicked off earlier than in the summer. It was not until the late 1950s that floodlights became commonplace and subsequently allowed for every match to kick-off at a later time.³² The consequence of mid-week afternoon football was that it led to mass absenteeism from work and school (The Kop, p. 24). The principal employment in Liverpool at this time was on the docks and most of this was casual labour. This meant that missing work was of little consequence, apart from the loss of a day's wage. But it did necessitate a certain amount of deceit and discovery of attendance at a football match could lead to family difficulties (ibid.) and even employment problems.

The principal event which impacted on football fans during this period, and in particular on Manchester United fans, was the Munich air disaster on 6 February 1958 when a BEA Elizabethan airline crashed on take-off from Munich airport. This proved to be a turning point in the history of Manchester United Football Club and its fans. A total of 23 passengers were killed, including eight players. A number of backroom staff, journalists, and flight crew also died. The disaster was to have a dramatic effect on fans and was to change the course of Manchester United's history.³³

The transcripts of interviews can never fully convey the emotion and the depth of sadness with which fans remembered both the Munich and the Hillsborough disasters but even so there is a genuine sense of its drama and overwhelming impact. On a number of occasions interviews had to be halted so that interviewees could compose themselves. Even though the Munich disaster had been 40 years earlier, its impact on a generation was still felt very deeply. Many testified that the disaster cemented their relationship to the club and made them identify even more with Manchester United (Red Voices, pp. 81-107).

³² Liverpool switched on their floodlights in 1957, the same year as Manchester United who inaugurated their lights in March 1957, shortly before their European Cup semi-final against Real Madrid..

³³ For a full account of the Munich air disaster, see Taylor (1983). Three of the players killed were regular England internationals while two more at least might have been expected to play with England in the World Cup finals due to take place later that year. England reached the quarter finals but might well have succeeded further had their squad not been decimated by the disaster.

The 1960s and 70s: The Emergence of Fanatical Fandom.

During the 1960s the Kop became famed as the first terracing where the then phenomenon of singing and chanting emerged. It had always been regarded as one of the noisiest terraces in Britain and the success of Liverpool in European competition during the 1960s and over the next twenty years would help promote the Kop as one of the most celebrated football terracings in Europe.

The Kop became the area where the most fervent Liverpool fans gathered to support their team. The term 'Kopite'³⁴, to describe the fans who stood on the Kop, was seen as a term of endearment and helped codify their identity and identification with each other and with their team (The Kop, p. 41). The mass publicity which the Kop attracted during the 1960s, in newspapers and on television, also cemented this identity and relationship. Fans were 'proud' to be known as Kopites.

What also emerges from many of the interviews is the importance of the rite of passage, especially on the Kop. At the core of fandom lies the importance of an initiator, usually the father. The child is introduced to the notion of support or fandom by the initiator, though initially this does not necessarily involve active fandom at a football ground. Only when the child (usually male rather than female) has reached a certain age will they be introduced to active fandom. This involves attendance at a football match with the child being introduced to the Kop or wherever by perhaps initially serving an 'apprenticeship' in the Boy's Pen. (The Kop, p. 56 and p. 46). Once an apprenticeship had been served in the Boys' Pen, and as they grew older, (and in particular taller) they would then be introduced to the Kop itself (The Boot Room Boys, p. 16). This process normally involved being accompanied on the Kop by a father or an elder family member, often a brother, acting as the initiator. It is also clear from the evidence that this process is not a recent phenomenon but that generations have followed a similar pattern. Even Stanley Doig (The Kop, p. 7) testifies to having been taken to football matches by family elders as a youngster as far back as 1907.

The principal communal activity to emerge during the 1960s and 1970s was initially chanting and then singing. The roots of this phenomenon have never been adequately explained. Harry Wilson (The Kop, p. 15) is adamant that the chanting of the players' names was commonplace as long ago as the 1920s and Joe Martin points out that there was singing in the 1950s (The Kop, p. 25). Lack of recordings of football matches however make it difficult to verify when chanting began precisely.³⁵ The author's own experience is that chanting began in the 1962/63 season and in particular began at Liverpool and Everton.

³⁴ No evidence has ever been put forward to show where or when the term 'Kopite' was first used but it appears to have been in common currency, certainly within the Liverpool area, since the 1950s and it is not unreasonable therefore to suppose that its origins come from the local press.

³⁵ In the Leni Riefenstahl film of the 1936 Berlin Olympic Games, Olympiad, (Germany, 1936) it is possible to hear the distinct chant of 'USA, USA, USA' from the crowd during some of the athletic events. Chanting can also be heard in support of Italian athletes. This is possibly the first audio recording of any chanting at a sports event.

Andi Thomas (The Kop, p. 59) argues that it was the release of the record Let's Go in 1962 by The Routers, with a particularly rhythmic handclap which inspired the use of similar rhythmic handclapping by fans. The chanting of the team's name was soon added to this. The name of the Liverpool forward Ian St John was the first individual to be promoted in this way through rhythmic handclapping. What we can say with certainty is that chanting at Liverpool and at neighbouring Goodison Park, the home of Everton Football Club, had become prevalent by 1962.

It is important to make especial reference to the rise of Liverpool at the time as a city of music. In October 1962 the Beatles released their first record Love Me Do (Coleman, 2000) and in January 1963 they released She Loves You (op cit), which was to become their first major hit record. The subsequent frenzy which surrounded the record and 'Beatlemania' led to the national rise of Merseybeat music which was to spread across the nation and beyond. This coincided with the success of the football club which in 1962 had been promoted to the first division, followed two years later by their winning the league championship. In between, their neighbours Everton had also won the First Division championship, making Liverpool not just a prominent national focus for comedy and music but also for football. Social historians have talked of this period in Liverpool as a social revolution.³⁶ Even the new Labour Government, was led by a Prime Minister representing a Liverpool constituency.³⁷

The growing national popularity of Liverpool bands during the 1960s led to a reinforcement of identity with Liverpool culture. Surprisingly, some interviewees report that there had been singing at Anfield prior to the 1960s (The Kop, p. 25) although they stress that generally it tended to be organised and was usually a brass band with a conductor playing at half time or before kick off. It was not however until the emergence of what was to become known as 'Merseybeat' in the early 1960s that singing really surfaced on the Kop although importantly, it was now informal and spontaneous.

Because of the success of Liverpool at this time large crowds were in attendance and it was often the case that the Kop would be filled with the gates closed an hour beforehand. From the oral evidence produced by these books it seems that there was little to occupy them in the vast crowd as they waited for kick off. Consequently, fans would amuse themselves by singing along with the records that were usually being played over the tannoy system (The Kop, p.59). Often these were recordings by one of the many pop groups emerging out of Liverpool at that time. This singing soon developed along its own lines with the lyrics usually changed to reflect the 'glories' of Liverpool Football Club and their players.

³⁶ See Lane, T., Liverpool, City of the Sea, Liverpool, Liverpool University Press, 1997.

³⁷ Harold Wilson, although born in Huddersfield, had been raised on the Wirral and was the Member of Parliament for the Huyton constituency in Liverpool. As much as anybody (apart from the Beatles), Wilson helped raise the profile of the city of Liverpool both nationally and internationally. Wilson was elected Prime Minister in October 1964 and held office until June 1970. He would enjoy a second period of office between 1974 and 1976. For further details on Wilson see Pimlott, B., Harold Wilson, London, Harper Collins, 1992.

In particular there has long been debate over when and why Liverpool fans began singing You'll Never Walk Alone. Some of these questions are answered by Gerry Marsden (The Kop, p. 62) who recalls that his record of the song was released in October 1963 and that it was first sung on the Kop six weeks later.

Within weeks of its release the record became a major hit, topping the record charts in Britain. The song had originally been composed in 1945 by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein for their musical Carousel. The song was soon to become associated with Liverpool Football Club and taken up as their 'anthem'. Again the adoption of their own 'anthem' reinforces the concept of identity for the Liverpool fan. Even to this day it remains a puzzle as to why it should have been adopted by Liverpool fans as their particular song although the lyrics clearly speak of success through adversity. It has since been taken up by many football clubs throughout the world, including Glasgow Celtic and Internazionale Milan

There is evidence, nonetheless, to suggest that the singing at matches was not always as spontaneous as imagined (The Kop, p. 64). Groups of supporters regularly met informally prior to games to compose, learn and sing songs, usually in the pub during the week or even prior to the match. (The Kop, p. 58). These songs would then be replicated on the Kop, stemming from the composing community. They would very quickly be taken up by others within the dominant locality. Often fans would put their own words to the music to make them more apposite to their team or to individual players. Astonishingly, these songs, on occasion, could even be produced to order (The Kop, p. 221). A list of many of the songs and their lyrics were compiled and reproduced, for the first time, in The Kop. From these songs it is possible to see how they were adapted to suit the team, events and players

Humour also began to play a role. The city of Liverpool has long been associated with humour and numerous well known comedians have emerged from the city over the years.³⁸ During the 1960s, two comedians, Ken Dodd and Jimmy Tarbuck, were regarded as paramount in their trade with both of them laying great emphasis on the city's culture and its football in their stage acts and public comments. Liverpool humour was consequently prominent in the media and matched the national attitude towards Liverpool.

The three strands of music, humour and footballing successes were to converge on the Kop as supporters sang Beatles songs and tried to outwit opposition fans by creating chants and songs which demonstrated their depth of humour. And as the media and public picked up on this wit, so it perpetuated its own myth.

The Liverpool manager Bill Shankly³⁹ also pinpointed the vital role that the Kop and its spectators played when he talked about their part in the success of the club and how they were worth a goal start and could 'frighten the ball' into the back of the net (The Kop pp. 67, 68). His comments reinforced the link between spectators and players with the spectators convinced that they could play a role in the outcome of a game by making as much noise as possible.

³⁸ These have included Tommy Handley, Rob Wilton, Arthur Askey, Ted Ray, Ken Dodd and Jimmy Tarbuck.

³⁹ Bill Shankly was the manager of Liverpool from December 1959 to July 1974 and is generally regarded as the person who changed the club's fortunes and created the club as it is today. For further details see Kelly, S. Shankly: It's Much More Important Than That, London, Virgin, 1996.

This need to identify with the Kop was as much synonymous with the players and the coaching staff as it was with the fans. Within the city the Kop had become a cultural icon. The importance of the Kop to the coaching staff of Liverpool is well documented in the The Boot Room Boys. Various Liverpool managers throughout the past 40 years, including Frenchman Gerard Houllier (The Boot Room Boys, pp. 270-1), have spoken in awe of the Kop and in particular have articulated its importance to the team. Players (The Boot Room Boys, p. 42) have also voiced this importance and speak of being inspired by it.

Prior to the 1970s, it had not been uncommon for away supporters of any club to congregate on the Kop or the Stretford End. There was no expectation of danger or violence, and indeed it was rare for any section of the ground to be sectioned-off for the exclusive use of visiting fans. The later emergence of violence at football grounds and the subsequent segregation of fans however brought an end to this practice.

Entrance to areas like the Kop and the Stretford End were by payment, at the turnstiles, on the day. This practice used to result in lengthy queues outside some football stadia, particularly at Anfield and Old Trafford with their large fan base. The advantage of this system however was its informality which allowed fans to make decisions about attending matches at the last minute. The queuing which was accepted as a part of spectatorship could be an exhausting, lengthy and occasionally dangerous process, and at times a frustrating one as the turnstiles were closed just as you were about to reach them. (The Kop, p. 39). For some matches it meant that fans had to be at the ground early in order to guarantee entrance. However, it was also a common practice for tickets to be sold a few days in advance for major games on the basis of first come, first served. This usually related to FA Cup ties or major European games. This practice led to further queuing and in some cases overnight queuing to purchase tickets in advance. This provided rich experiences for some fans and on one occasion proved to be chaotic for both police and fans (The Kop, pp. 144-5).

Other technical developments which encouraged the growth and development of the game include the introduction of floodlights in the late 1950s. Not only did this vitalise the growth of European football competition but provided a theatrical backdrop to the drama of the evening's entertainment.

The entry of Liverpool and Manchester United into European competition offered even greater opportunities for travel and, for many, the first opportunity to travel abroad. (Red Voices, p. 127). This experience may have broadened some horizons but judging by the tales told by many fans in The Kop, foreign culture barely penetrated the Liverpool skin!

Identity is clearly evidenced as an increasingly important aspect of football fandom.⁴⁰ At Liverpool the Kop was regarded as the locality within the ground where the most fervent of fans wanted to congregate. At Manchester United, the Stretford End was similarly regarded as the most popular terracing for such fans. For those fans locating on the Kop, it was of paramount importance to be identified as such. As a consequence, fans wishing to be identified as the most fervent and committed, automatically gathered there. This need to identify had not been so strong during before 1960 but its importance grew as the team's fortunes also grew and the competitiveness of English football increased throughout the period. In the media and throughout football the Kop was perceived as a vital component in the club's success on the field and as a consequence its importance to fans also increased. As the city of Liverpool's image and status around the world grew on the back of the Beatles' success, so more and more Liverpoolians wanted to identify with the city. This could best be demonstrated through their support of either Liverpool or Everton football clubs. The combination of Merseybeat, a Liverpool based Prime Minister, Liverpool comedians and a thriving new car plant at Halewood as well as the football teams' successes, brought a new degree of optimism and pride that had been absent during the grey years of the 1950s and Depression of the 1930s.

It is apparent from interviews that there is also a sub-division of locality (The Kop, p. 31). Even within the locality of the Kop itself fans would congregate in a sub-locality and would settle in this locality for each game. In Liverpool terminology this was known as their 'spec'. As a result of this continuity of locality, it became possible for fans to attend matches alone and still be able to inter-act within their local community (ibid.). Fans would even keep places for each other (The Kop, p. 33). But this was not a phenomenon associated only with Liverpool. At Manchester United similar experiences are recorded and there is no reason to believe that it was not prevalent at many other football grounds.

Equally, standing at football matches allowed fans to go to matches with friends and to stand alongside them at the match. Everyone discovered their own locality and could talk articulately about precisely where it was and its importance to them. This phenomenon however was to change with the introduction of the all-seater stadia in 1993.

The sight of 25,000 fans on the Kop, crushed, swaying and singing was also a visual gift to television directors and photographers alike. A noted BBC Television Panorama programme (transmitted 20.4.64) of the period featured the Kop in full voice with a reporter, standing in front of the swaying, singing Kop, commenting that 'as Napoleon said of his troops, I don't know what they do to the enemy but they sure frighten the hell out of me!'⁴¹

As television pictures of the Kop were transmitted across the country and Europe, so too did the need of many more in Liverpool to identify with the club's success and the Kop's growing fame. The Kop soon became the place to be, the place where you could most identify with being a Liverpudlian. And nor was it uncommon for fans of other clubs to want to stand on the Kop simply to experience its drama. (The Kop, p. 47).

⁴⁰ For a general overview of identity as football phenomena see Brown, A., (ed) Fanatics, Power, Identity & Fandom in Football, London, Routledge, 1998.

⁴¹ That Panorama, a noted BBC current affairs programme should devote an entire hour long production to the emergence of singing on the Kop highlights the importance attached to this cultural phenomenon.

True fandom, at the time, therefore became identified by a number of factors. These were: first, standing, rather than sitting at a game; second, locating oneself behind the goal; third, locating in the cheapest area of the ground; fourth, expressing and identifying communally through singing and chanting; and fifth, the wearing of appropriate team colours (this will be discussed later).

Prior to Parliamentary legislation being introduced in 1975 to control crowds⁴² and to ease overcrowding at football grounds, there had been considerable swaying on the Kop as fans pushed and moved in one direction and another. Although there were dangers inherent in this, no major accidents ever occurred (The Kop, pp. 99-100). Nevertheless it led to difficult logistical problems for the St John Ambulance and the police (The Kop, p. 94). Given the difficulties for these services to operate on the Kop, particularly when it was full, it was common practice for bodies to be passed down the Kop and over the heads of spectators (The Kop, p. 34). Usually it was people who had simply fainted in the heat.

At Manchester United's ground, Old Trafford, the area most similar to the Kop was known as the Stretford End. Although it was not as large and did not hold as many spectators as the Kop, it was nevertheless a substantial terracing that attracted the most fervent supporters. It is apparent from the interviews that the Kop and the Stretford End tended to be the preserve of younger men. The considerable swaying that was experienced on the Kop, although it never resulted in any major accidents, was not favourable to the elderly. Youthfulness and fitness became a necessary prerequisite in order to survive the rigours of these terracings. (The Kop, pp. 99-102).

Some interviewees record how it was possible to begin spectating in one locality but to end up more than twenty yards away in an entirely different area. Sometimes this could result in the loss of clothing, particularly shoes though items such as wedding rings and watches were regularly discovered when the Kop was swept and cleaned (The Kop, p. 98). As a consequence, older fans, for reasons of safety and comfort, tended to end their active association with the Kop by the age of forty and either moved to another safer, more comfortable standing area in the ground or, if their social status in life had improved, pay higher prices for a seat (The Kop, p. 262).

Identity was not shaped by location alone. It was (and still is) also shaped by the wearing of team colours. In the 1950s, and before, this amounted to little more than a red and white scarf, a rosette or coloured bobble hat, most of which were home produced. (The Kop, p. 41). During the 1970s however, new specially manufactured merchandise appeared on the commercial market for the first time, leading to the production and wearing of official team shirts. By the 1980s, as clubs realised the financial potential of such merchandise, it had increased to any number of items from jerseys, scarves, headwear, keyrings and training tops to a wide range of team shirts. The wearing of some form of identity was regarded as almost obligatory on the Kop and the Stretford End.

⁴² The Safety of Sports Grounds Act, 1975

Although the culture of the Kop continued much the same in the 1970s, a more sinister and zealous culture was beginning to emerge in the shape of hooliganism.⁴³ This would continue into the 1980s eventually bringing shame to the club with the disaster at the Heysel stadium in Brussels. The emergence of this new culture may have had its roots elsewhere but inevitably it was taken up by other clubs, including both Liverpool and Manchester United.

The ability to travel to away games was a major factor in the emergence of violence. Prior to the 1960s any travel to away matches would be by organized coaches or British Rail football specials. This could be costly and needed organization. Hence, it tended to be older fans who travelled. However, the availability of cars to a younger generation in the 1970s meant that fans could travel to games far cheaper and consequently led to far more fans travelling and to younger fans.

Contrary to popular belief violence and misbehaviour at football matches has always existed and evidence of this is recorded in The Kop (p. 118) with a fan invading the pitch and assaulting an opposition player during the 1930s. Violence however tended to be sporadic, isolated and unorganised. Nonetheless, during the 1970s as Redhead (1991) has argued, the nature of football violence changed. It became more formal, more violent, involved more people and also became a means of strengthening fan identity with the team. A gang culture among football hooligans also emerged with gangs intent on reflecting the glories of their team in the streets and on the terraces through violence against opposition fans.⁴⁴ In some cases however the gangs had few links with traditional fandom with football simply being a means to organised violence.

Although there is plenty of evidence, through court records, to show that Liverpool fans contributed more than their fair share to the growing social problem of football hooliganism, the general view has always been that Liverpool fans were rarely the perpetrators of the violence (Mason, 1985). As Harry Leather suggests however (The Kop, p. 43), they were ready to meet the challenge if it occurred. Liverpool fans tended to be more associated with stealing, and particularly the taking of clothes from High Street shops, especially across Western Europe on European trips where designer label clothes proved far too tempting and far too easy to steal. They would then be worn at home as a 'badge' to promote the team's European successes and their own commitment to the club.

Although Liverpool fans were rarely classified as among the most violent in the country there is little doubt from the oral evidence that they nevertheless participated in various forms of illegal and anti-social behaviour. Most of this occurred on away trips with little violence at Anfield itself. Indeed, many observe that the Kop, for all its overcrowding, was a 'safe' area, free from any violence (The Kop, pp. 44-5). It was also considered by visiting fans to be a difficult area to penetrate.

⁴³ For a more detailed account of the rise of hooliganism, see Redhead (1991).

⁴⁴ There is a considerable library of publications on hooliganism, ranging from personal experience accounts to sociological analyses. Some are listed in the bibliography. For a full account of the literature, see Redhead, S., Hit and Tell, A Review Essay on the Soccer Hooligan Memoir, Soccer and Society, 5 (3). pp. 391-402. November 2004.

Hooliganism connected with Manchester United was however, more pronounced. United were not always a popular club and being a United fan brought with it a degree of unpopularity. A hooligan culture soon became closely associated with the club (Red Voices, p. 154). During the early 1970s Manchester United also struggled and in 1974 they were relegated to the Second Division. The impact of United's relegation however was ironically to strengthen the fan base. A number of interviewees testify that this was the time when they decided that the club most needed their support (Red Voices, p. 148). In particular United's away support increased as the team travelled to grounds they had not played on before and the supporters had never seen. There was a novelty element as well as a determination to flaunt their support and authority (Red Voices, p. 150).⁴⁵

The success of Liverpool Football Club and its growing reputation as one of the strongest teams in Europe during the 1970s and 1980s, led to regular travel across the continent in support of the their team. Indeed, Manchester United fans had become well versed in European travel during the 1950s and 1960s when their club was challenging for European honours.

Growing affluence in the 1960s and the emergence of cheap charter flights as well as car travel, widened the possibility of foreign travel to fans. Although not all fans could afford the luxury of air travel, many fans by 'clubbing' together could afford to take a car on a short hop across the channel. It soon became common not just for four or five fans to share a car to an away venue but also to travel to European matches.

Partly as a result of this, during the 1980s, identity took on a further twist in the shape of fashion. For a number of decades the usual form of identity had been maintained through the wearing of team colours, team shirts, scarves or hats. These aspects immediately identified the 'true' fan and it was indeed rare to see anyone on the Kop, or in the case of Manchester United, the Stretford End, without at least one of these identifying factors.

But in the 1980s some fans began to dress more formally and in High Street fashions. Quite where this trend began has never been accurately pinpointed as many groups of fans boast that they initiated the trend. However it was, as interviews suggest, an important aspect of support for Liverpool. (The Kop, pp. 44-5). Liverpool fans were undoubtedly among the earliest to adopt these fashions and indeed may have been the first. Folklore has it, and this is borne out in interviews, that Liverpool fans supporting their side across Europe stole quality fashionable clothing from leading retail shops on the continent. The wearing of fashionable clothes was partly a means of displaying that the club was successful and playing in Europe, in contrast to those teams who enjoyed only domestic football. Consequently fashion became associated with hooliganism as fans chose to take on the identity of fashion rather than team colours in order to make themselves more anonymous for away trips to opposition grounds. This provided fans with a 'surprise' tactic.

⁴⁵ United spent just one season in division two (1974/75) and were promoted as champions at the end of the season.

Travelling to European games became a highlight of the period, offering opportunities for foreign travel that many fans had never previously experienced and would have found difficulties in experiencing through the course of their normal life styles (Red Voices, p. 127). But under the auspices of travelling with either Liverpool or Manchester United football clubs they could travel cheaper and safer. There was undoubtedly an adventure aspect to this. Travelling with friends also made travel not only more 'fun' but secure and comfortable. Problems could be shared. If difficulties arose then there were friends to help resolve those difficulties. Lack of a language skill, cultural unawareness, getting lost, could all be treated as 'fun' if there was more than one person sharing the problem. It also tested the ingenuity of some fans, many of whom could not afford transport costs to foreign games (Red Voices, p. 116). In particular Liverpool's first appearance in the European Cup Final in 1977 in Rome was for many their first experience of foreign travel.⁴⁶

European competition with its increasing fan travel inevitably meant that the worsening English football culture of violence was also exported.⁴⁷ For Manchester United fans it was in many ways to be a similar experience although again they were not always the perpetrators of violence. (Red Voices, p. 200).

Inside Anfield there were few reported violent incidents (The Kop, p. 84). Police measures including crowd control, segregation and the 'fortress' reputation of the ground itself, and the Kop in particular, kept violence to a low level. Rarely did opposition fans as a group, intent on violence, ever attempt to enter the Kop. When violence did occur it was outside the ground, in streets surrounding the stadium or on the route to the railway station. It was in such vicinities that violence was easier to organize and escape from (Red Voices, p. 154). Closed circuit television, introduced towards the end of the period was to have a marked effect in cutting down violence.

But despite Liverpool's generally acknowledged avoidance of violence the club was to become tainted as a result of the Heysel Disaster on 25th May 1985 when 39 fans of Juventus Football Club were killed prior to the European Cup final between Liverpool and Juventus.⁴⁸

The consequences of the Heysel disaster were that Liverpool fans were blamed for the events and English football clubs were banned from competing in Europe for a period of five years with the ban on Liverpool specifically extended for a further year. This would have a dramatic effect on the international fortunes of Liverpool and at a time when it was at its height in European competition. More positively however the ban resulted in more dramatic and effective measures being taken domestically to deal with the problem of football hooliganism and violence.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ It was estimated that as many as 20,000 fans travelled to the game (Liverpool Echo, 26.5.77).

⁴⁷ For a more detailed discussion of this see Chapter by John Williams, Kopites, Scallies and Liverpool Fan Cultures: Tales of Triumph and Disaster in Williams, J. Hopkins, S. & Long, C., eds, (2001).

⁴⁸ Surprisingly little has been written about the Heysel disaster but for an overall fans' view of the disaster, see Kelly, S., ed (1992) A Game of Two Halves, Eyewitness At Heysel, p. 429. See also Laclemece, P., (1998) Plus Jamais: De Heysel à Sheffield. Paris.

The process of needing to identify as a Liverpudlian as well as a fan of the football club is cited as an important aspect of standing on the Kop for many exiled Liverpudlians at this time. It also appears to have been far more crucial in Liverpool than in Manchester. This can be explained, in part, by the decline in population of Liverpool, particularly during this period. Significant numbers had moved out of the city centre as older properties were knocked down and renovation took place. During the 1970s and 1980s many moved to new towns on the fringes of Liverpool, such as Skelmersdale and Kirby, while others moved to outlying areas such as the Wirral, St Helens, Warrington, Chester and even Manchester, where employment was more available.⁵⁰ As a result it was important for some exiles to reinforce their identity with Liverpool by returning to the city whenever they could and standing on the Kop for each match and partaking of the forceful culture that emanated from that locality. By standing on the Kop they could re-identify with their roots (The Kop, p. 29).

As the oral evidence suggests, for many decades football stadia were the preserve of white, working-class males. Prior to the introduction of all-seater stadia in the 1990s it was unusual to see women at football grounds, and in particular to see them on the Kop (The Kop, pp. 22-3) where safety conditions also tended to discourage female support. Again this was generally the case at most football grounds (Red Voices, p. 208). Nevertheless, there is evidence from interviews to suggest that daughters accompanied their fathers to matches and went through the same rites of passages as males.⁵¹ Prior to the Second World War however there is little evidence of women attending football matches. The first signs of any change appear to have begun after the war (The Kop, p. 23). The emergence of George Best at Manchester United as a superstar also helped attract women to football matches at old Trafford.⁵²

It was often now more common to see women standing at football matches than to see anyone from one of the ethnic communities. Liverpool FC was no exception and the experience for many black supporters was a difficult one (The Kop, pp. 48-9). Similarly, at Manchester United, the experience was fraught. (Red Voices, p. 155). And this in spite ⁴⁹ The Prime Minister, Mrs Thatcher, was to introduce a number of measures aimed at eliminating violence.

⁵⁰ The population of the city centre of Liverpool fell from a high of 800,000 in 1951 to 441,674 in 2002. (Government census statistics, quoted in Liverpool Daily Post, 10.9.04).

⁵¹ For a contemporary experience further evidence is provided by Liz Crolley and Cathy Long in their chapter Sitting Pretty? Women and Football in Liverpool (see Williams, J., Hopkins, S., and Long, C. (2001).

⁵² Interestingly women were more likely to be found on the football pitch rather than on the terraces prior to the Second World War. Dick, Kerr Ladies Football Club played many friendlies on English league grounds and actually played in front of 53,000 fans at Goodison Park in Liverpool on Boxing Day, 1920. A year later women were banned from playing at League grounds by the English Football Association. This in effect ended the women's game in England for many years. For further details see Newsham, G., (1997) The Dick, Kerr Ladies Football Club, London, Preston, Scarlett.

of the fact that both Liverpool and Manchester boasted substantial ethnic populations. For many black people attendance at football matches was consequently not a common feature of their lives. Racist chanting and racist comments were also common, leading occasionally to retaliatory violence (Red Voices, p. 156).⁵³

Identity took on a further twist in the 1980s when the cultural division between spectators became exacerbated. Much of this division was caused by the introduction in many grounds of executive boxes where fans could be entertained, fed, and watch instant video replays of the match from the comfort of a lounge area behind glass windows. Although executive boxes have subsequently become the standard at most football grounds, their introduction caused a fierce debate at the time as fans in the cheaper areas called into question the legitimacy of those fans in expensive executive boxes to call themselves fans of the same club. (Red Voices, p. 255). It consequently became even more important for the fan on the Kop or the Stretford End to assert their identity as the truly committed fan. As a result fans in those localities reinforced their own identity in the form of wearing more club-associated colours or dress in order that they would stand out from those in executive boxes who would probably be dressed more formally. In the case of Manchester United which boasted more executive areas than any other club, the traditional fan became concerned at the economic direction of their club. Concern was in particular directed at Manchester United's decision to become a quoted stock exchange company⁵⁴ and the financial implications involved. In particular it was feared that it would lead to more executive boxes, a changing culture in fandom, and the possibility of takeovers (Red Voices, p. 268). All of these fears were to be borne out with time.⁵⁵

As a consequence there existed a social division between those fans watching from the cheaper sections of the ground and those spectators sitting in the more costly areas. The banter however was generally light-hearted although at Liverpool there existed a strong belief from all spectators that the Kop was very much the 'soul of the club' and that this was where its impetus and dynamism lay. (The Kop, p. 17). During the 1960s and 1970s it was not uncommon for the Kop to ask, in unison, for other parts of the ground to respond to some vocal request. Such requests were sometimes for them to sing a song or for information, such as who had been the goalscorer. There was rarely a response from those who were seated.

Ritual and superstition have been well documented as phenomena with many sports fans.⁵⁶ Again this seems to have become more pronounced in this period. Prior to each

⁵³ Liverpool Football Club was to be the centre of a fierce racist debate in the autumn of 1987 when new signing John Barnes, a black player, was greeted with racist daubings on the walls of Anfield. For a fuller description of the Barnes issue, see Hill, (1989).

⁵⁴ Manchester United became a public limited company in 1991 with a Stock Exchange listing. They de-listed in June 2005.

⁵⁵ In May 2005 the American millionaire Malcolm Glazer took over Manchester United football Club after purchasing a majority stake in the club. By June 2005 his stake had risen to over 97 per cent, thus allowing him to de-list the company from the stock exchange and take it entirely into private ownership.

⁵⁶ Nick Hornby in Fever Pitch writes lyrically about his own superstitions and rituals both before going to watch Arsenal at Highbury and during the course of the game. (Hornby, N. (1992) Fever Pitch, London, match most fans follow a set routine (or ritual). This may involve the wearing of the same clothes, taking the same route to the game, standing in the same spot or following some identical procedure before and during the game (The Kop, p. 55). Again there is evidence to suggest that ritual has a long tradition in fandom, and, as would be expected, many interviewees both at Liverpool and Manchester United readily confessed their own rituals.

The Munich air disaster of February 1958 left 23 persons dead. Eight Manchester United players also died in the crash. The disaster is covered in detail in Red Voices. The impact of this disaster on fans was highly emotional and even to this day brought about highly emotional responses during interviews (see Methodology). In particular it highlighted the strong emotional attachment which fans had to their football club and the powerful memories that still linger from the time of the disaster.

Just as the Munich air disaster had a devastating effect on the fans of Manchester United, so the Hillsborough disaster of April 1989 had a similar effect on fans of Liverpool. The disaster at Hillsborough on 15 April 1989 led to the deaths of 96 Liverpool fans.⁵⁷ One of the after-effects of the disaster was that it gave a further momentum to identification as the Kop became a focus for grieving and memorialisation.⁵⁸ On the Monday following the disaster Liverpool Football Club allowed its gates to be opened so that fans could lay wreaths on the Kop where the family or colleagues of those who had died in the disaster, normally stood. Many fans also tied scarves or club shirts to the crush barriers on the Kop. The Kop quickly became a shrine. Within days hundreds of thousands of fans, mainly from Liverpool but also from other clubs, had visited the ground, walking respectfully towards the Kop where they lay their wreaths and mementos. The number of flowers and wreaths left became so numerous that a week after the disaster they had not only filled most of the Kop but had been extended onto the pitch filling half the pitch itself. For many the ability to be able to visit the Kop undoubtedly had a cathartic effect and played a vital part in the healing process for the wider community. The Hillsborough disaster has not been covered in any detail in The Kop as an excellent oral history has already been published (Taylor, 1993). What I have been more concerned with has been the impact of the disaster on future spectatorship.

Gollancz.). See also Morris, D. (1981) The Soccer Tribe, London, Cape, who writes in detail about rituals from both the player and fan point of view.

⁵⁷ The disaster occurred within minutes of the start of the FA Cup semi-final between Liverpool and Nottingham Forest played at Hillsborough, the home of Sheffield Wednesday Football Club.

⁵⁸ The disaster had occurred when a gate was opened by the police to allow queuing fans quick entry into the stadium. Sadly, the gate led spectators into a penned area behind the goal which was already packed with supporters. The impact of further fans into this area caused a major crush resulting in the deaths of 96 Liverpool fans. It was the worst disaster in British sporting history. See Lord Justice Taylor (1989) Interim Report into the Hillsborough Stadium Disaster, CMND 765, HMSO.

The 1990s: The ‘Bourgeoisification’ of Football Fandom

The Taylor Report, following the Hillsborough disaster in April 1989 called for the introduction of all-seater stadia among its various recommendations. As a result of the Taylor Report the Government brought in legislation to introduce all-seater stadia in the higher divisions.⁵⁹

In February 1992 the first division clubs of the Football League took a decision to break away from the Football League and set up the FA Premier League on the basis that they could then negotiate a financially lucrative deal for the live television coverage of games. The FA Premier League officially kicked off for the 1992/3 season. Subsequent deals for television coverage and the major commercialisation of the game in subsequent years also helped attract football to a new audience.

Following the Taylor Report, the Kop, which in 1994 was the only remaining terracing/standing area at the Anfield Ground, was demolished and replaced with a new all-seater stand which has been given the slightly modified name ‘The Kop Grandstand’. Seating at Old Trafford had already been introduced and interviews in Red Voices recorded the fans’ responses to the introduction of these all-seating areas. Their responses proved to be highly revealing and significant. As a result when a new edition of The Kop was suggested by another publishers, Virgin, in 2004, I was able to include a new chapter to take into account the impact of all-seating on the nature and culture of fandom at Liverpool Football Club as well. Again this was to prove illuminating and brought into focus the importance of having conducted so many interviews prior to the demolition of the Kop. Those interviews suddenly took on an historical importance that will be of increasing value to future researchers. It is also probably safe to suggest that about half those who attend matches at Manchester United and Liverpool today will never have experienced standing on terraces at a football match.

Since the introduction of the all-seater stadium and changing ticketing arrangements, some traditional aspects of the rite of passage have also changed. The Boy’s Pen no longer exists either at Liverpool or Manchester United so that the traditional ‘apprenticeship’ has ended. The increase in women at football matches has also led to the initiator often being identified as the mother as well as the father while family attendance has become more commonplace. The demolition of the Kop has also meant that fathers/mothers and sons’ daughters can sit together on the Kop in safety.

Until the introduction of the Premier League in 1991 and a shift towards all ticket games, the normal culture was to pay ‘at the gate’ on the day. With the introduction of ticket only games and membership schemes, this spontaneity has disappeared so that attendance has become more formalised. Fans not only need to be organised in deciding which matches to attend but also organised in acquiring tickets. (Red Voices, p. 254). Prices have increased and in the case of Manchester United availability is so limited that fans need to purchase season tickets in order to guarantee attendance. Inevitably the process has become far more expensive. This in turn has also changed the demographic makeup of fans with younger fans now more likely to be excluded because of cost (Red Voices, p. 269). Today's fans tend therefore to be well paid, middle aged, attending with their family, female, and from ethnic minority backgrounds.

⁵⁹ For further information on the Hillsborough disaster, see Taylor, R. (1990) The Day of the Hillsborough Disaster, Liverpool, Liverpool University Press.

The 1990s have also brought demographic changes in the makeup of the fan base. Improved transportation (particularly the introduction of cheap air flights to and from Europe to Liverpool John Lennon airport and Manchester International Airport), the increasing popularity of the Premiership and the globalization of the game, have meant that the fan base has spread far beyond the normal city limits. Support may still come predominantly from within a ten-mile radius of the city centre but supporters from outside of that radius were arriving in greater number by the 1980s although they could still be counted in their hundreds rather than their thousands. Once into the 1990s, however, the success of Liverpool and also Manchester United has attracted growing numbers of supporters from outside of the previous boundaries (Red Voices). Where once Liverpool supporters hailed only from Merseyside or Manchester United supporters from Manchester, the norm today is to hear accents and indeed languages from as far away as Scandinavia, Germany, Spain, or even Asia. Some of these long-distance visitors are interviewed in the books. Local fans also testify to the increasing number of languages heard at Anfield and Old Trafford. The trend of fans travelling from Scandinavia to Manchester United appears to have begun as far back as the 1960s following United's European Cup victory in May 1968 while Liverpool's foreign fan base stems from their years of success in Europe. The acquisition of well-known 'foreign' players also encourages football fans from those countries to follow their 'favourites' to English football. Similarly a foreign manager, in the case of Liverpool, Frenchman Gerard Houllier and then Spanish manager Rafael Benitez, has brought a massive influx of visiting fans from those countries.

Regular live coverage on television, following various lucrative deals with television broadcasters, has also helped introduce a new audience to football.⁶⁰ More women and members of ethnic communities have been attracted to the game and have subsequently become live consumers. The massive influx of money into the game has also attracted commercial businesses with facilities, such as executive boxes and hospitality areas, attracting a new clientele.

All these influences on football have brought about a new audience. Fans have generally become more middle class while more females and members of the ethnic communities now attend games. The geographical fan base has also widened, reflecting the globalisation of English football. And with it fandom and its many traditions has changed. Football has become respectable, a far cry from the attitude that existed in the 1970s and 80s.

⁶⁰ The first deal by Sky to televise live Premier League football in 1992/93 was £305 million. By 2009 a consortium of television broadcasters was paying more than £1.5 billion for the rights to televise live football.

Conclusion

It can be seen from the evidence which has been produced through the oral interviews in these books, that there is a wealth of first-hand accounts that have added to our knowledge of fandom and the social history of the game. This approach provides an important portfolio of evidence that can be built on although it can never be conclusive.

These books offer a substantial body of work into the history of fandom. They provide first hand accounts, going back to the 1920s and 30s, which today are of increasing value to academics investigating the experience of fandom, particularly as they are so contrasting to the modern experience. Their testimony has become even more important as they represent almost the only first-hand evidence available from the pre-war years since many of those interviewed for these books have since died. Their intrinsic value lies in that they are first-hand accounts rather than reported accounts or secondary accounts.

Not only has the experience for fans changed but also that of players and officials. In 1996 the boot room, for so long regarded as the ‘heart’ of Liverpool Football Club, was torn down to make way for a new press room. This was required for the 1996 European Football Championships as Anfield had been chosen as a major venue for games. Other changes also took place over the next few years, particularly at the club’s training ground, Melwood, which was revamped beyond recognition. The Boot Room Boys serves therefore as a unique testament to the physical importance of the boot room to players and officials whilst memories of training methods and the physical environment of Melwood are also reminders of a bygone era. Such memories are now becoming more difficult to recapture.

In compiling these studies I have been able to make valuable use of my own journalistic experience where interviewing is a vital skill. The correlation between journalism and oral history is well acknowledged. The ability to extract crucial information is a recognized part of the journalist/interviewer technique. This was particularly appropriate when it came to sensitive interviews about the Munich Air disaster. The interviewer also has to put the interviewee at ease as well as be able to talk with a wide range of personnel.

Being a journalist also meant that I was familiar with ethical issues relating to interviews and when interviewees requested confidentiality I was fully aware of its meaning and the need to respect that confidentiality.⁶¹ As a journalist I was also familiar with the importance for fact-checking and accuracy as well as the need to be impartial. When editing I was acutely aware that all edited material should be reflective of an overall interview and not distort the facts or the balance of what I was being told. I also had to abide by the ethical considerations highlighted by the Oral History Society.

My extensive knowledge of football and its fans built up over more than forty years enabled me to have detailed insights into the game and an informed standpoint from which to conduct these interviews. As a supporter of Liverpool Football Club, I have personally experienced both standing on the Kop since 1962 and the changed environment since the introduction of seating. It meant that I was familiar with the subject material that I was considering through interviews and allowed me to empathise with my subjects. It also allowed me to have detailed knowledge of the most appropriate areas of questioning and gave me credibility with interviewees. However my journalistic training ensured that I was aware of the importance of remaining objective and to allow my interviewees to speak, rather than to ask leading questions or direct the line of questioning from a personal perspective. In particular my reputation as a journalist through my various publications allowed me access to interviewees which may not have been so readily possible to others. This was of especial importance when I was writing The Boot Room Boys as this involved not just interviewing fans but more crucially players and officials of Liverpool Football Club. It was similarly crucial with Red Voices as I was able to interview the chairman of Manchester United at an early stage. This interview subsequently facilitated interviews elsewhere with other prominent Manchester United officials and players.

⁶¹ Further information on ethical issues is dealt with under Methodology.

The studies however are not just a series of journalistic interviews. They are carefully thought out and structured. Using my experience as a journalist, areas of discussion have been formulated and structured after considerable reading of the relevant literature, particularly historical texts. There was an ongoing review of the questions to be posed and these reflected the areas of experience and interest of individual interviewees. An important feature of the interview process was the period of reflection and analysis following each interview which not only informed the subsequent interviews but my own approach and development as an interviewer. My knowledge of the history of the relevant clubs, through my other publications, has also been invaluable and has helped frame the research. These other publications relating to football reinforced my credibility as someone who was able to make informed comment on the sport. Having a national reputation as a sports writer meant that I was respected as a commentator, again facilitating easier access to interviewees.

The importance of this work was further re-emphasized by the updating and re-publication of The Kop in 2005 to include an additional chapter examining cultural changes on the Kop since it had been restructured as a seater-only area. This demonstrated that the work is not 'static' but has taken account of changes within stadium design. It illustrates an ongoing reflection, by analysing the cultural predicament before and after the introduction of seating. This was invaluable as I was able to revisit previous material and draw on earlier experiences and accounts to inform the revised book.

At the request of the FIFA Football Museum in Preston, many of the taped interviews were deposited in their archive, along with transcriptions and copies of the books for the use of future researchers and historians. I believe that this is authentication of their importance within academia to the study of football and in particular its fans. This deposit and these books have now become a valuable source of material for future historians. By making use of the material they can further develop theories and insights into the social history of football and the culture of football spectating.

An international academic conference on Oral History and Sport at the University of Huddersfield in April 2009 was only the second such conference to deal exclusively with oral testimony appertaining to sport. It featured contributions from the author and helped promote the importance of sport as an important area of research for oral historians. In his opening address to the conference, Dr Robert Perks, Secretary of the Oral History Society and Curator of the National Sound Archive at the British Library, paid tribute to the work done in the area of sport by myself.

My books have been the first to present a series of interviews which took account of, and considered, the experience of football and fandom from the perspective of the ordinary fan, addressing the range of experiences, responses and emotions to the game and all its aspects. It is this all rounded view that provides the greatest significance to my work. Although there are other textual sources, they are limited to describing commentaries on experience, whereas the oral testimony highlights the importance of football in people's lives as well as the relationship they have with particular clubs. This provides an essential contribution to the understanding of leisure in 20th century Britain. This should also be coupled with the fact that the vast amount of collected evidence is prior to 1993 when football grounds became all-seater and the traditional standing areas were demolished. It is now no longer possible to accrue much oral evidence on the experience of standing at football matches and its accompanying cultural experience. The three books present a well documented case for the importance of spectatorship within the context of social and leisure history. For many it provides a regular and important experience that is an essential, and in some cases an all-encompassing, activity in their social lives.

This argument was reinforced in an editorial in Oral History, the journal of the Oral History Society, which recognized that new work is being fulfilled in this area. 'Now, however, an emerging group of sports historians has recognized the value of oral techniques and is demanding a more thorough analysis of the role of sport in everyday life.' (Oral History, Spring 1997, Editorial, p.2).

The three texts were not only among the first such endeavours in this movement but also form a major contribution to our understanding of the importance of football and football fandom as a part of social history and an activity in the every day lives of many people. Through the oral testimony I have been able to identify a number of significant findings.

To begin with, I have identified three distinct periods of fandom. The first is identified as the period 1900 to 1960. I have called this 'people's fandom' as fans were largely in control of their own supporting activities within an informal structure highlighted by fans being able to gain access to most areas of the ground. Fans were able to mingle openly and socially on the same terrace as opposition fans. Many fans also had dual support of their other city club, demonstrating less tribal instincts in their support. The second period, 1960-1990 I have referred to as 'fanatical fandom'. In this period fandom became fanatical and tribal with the wearing of colours, accompanied by singing and chanting and a more aggressive attitude towards opposing fans and players. As a result football fandom changed dramatically, becoming more intense. Trips to away grounds by large numbers of visiting fans created opportunities, not only for new experiences but also for violence. The media also highlighted these 'events' through television pictures and headlines. As a consequence hooliganism emerged as a factor of this fanaticism with the result that grounds became segregated and fandom became more formal. The third period, 1990 to the present, I have identified as the 'bourgeoisification of fandom' and can be explained by the introduction of the all-seater stadia and the establishment of the Premier League in 1992 which helped make football popular to a new audience. This has led to an even more formalised approach to fandom. Television deals with a significant influx of money, price increases, growing media interest and an increasing popularity of the game, have all brought about greater commercialisation and have resulted in many changes, most noticeably in the makeup of fans.

My second significant finding has been in respect of the importance and commonality of rites of passage. In the past young people were initiated into fandom, usually by a father but sometimes by a mother or elder brother. They adopted a deliberate and traditional approach to fandom. This initiation took various forms, controlled by who took them to a match and their location within the ground or specific terrace. In recent years however this tradition has changed, governed now by the architecture and formality of the all-seater stadium. Whilst there are some differing approaches, rites of passage were largely the same at both Liverpool and Manchester United.

My third finding revolves around the importance and commonality of ritual. This can take various forms from superstition to dress code and spectator location. Although there may be minor changes in its modes, it remains largely the same as ever and is common to both clubs.

Fourth, I have identified that the emergence of chanting and singing during the 1960s began on the Kop at Liverpool Football Club and was subsequently adopted at other clubs. This was to become an important cultural aspect of fandom and continues to this day.

Fifth, I have identified the importance of social identity to fandom through location. Social identity takes the form not just of support for the football team but for the city as well and all that it represents. This is particularly the case with Liverpool Football Club and the need for fans to identify with the club and city by locating on the Kop, viewed by many fans as the 'heart and soul' of the club.

Sixth, the books have identified the importance of inter-action between fans and players. This has changed over the years, as players have become more alienated from their local communities but nonetheless remains a key element of fandom. Players and officials view the fans' involvement as 'enthusiasts' and important to the outcome of a game. Similarly fans believe that their support can have an impact on the result.

Finally, by the specific use of oral evidence, I have demonstrated that sport, and in particular football, like any many leisure activities, is a relevant area of study for academics. This democratisation of history through oral testimony is able to provide evidence for historians and academics which otherwise might never be formalised in a textual method. By examining fandom through oral interview we are able to gain a fresh and relevant perspective. Academics, oral historians and leading commentators on the game have all testified to the value of my work.

It is the establishment of these findings and their detailing through oral evidence that is the substance of my work. Some of these findings have been identified for the first time through the number and variety of oral interviews that are recorded in these books. As such the books contribute to the knowledge and experience of fandom, providing an insight into the history and trends of fandom during the 20th century.

The driving force of my work has been to re-focus the study of football history from events and personalities on the field to an appreciation of the fans' relationship with the game. By taking serious consideration of their experiences, through the use of oral testimony, I have been able to explore their passions, emotions and attitudes within an historical timeframe. Through this fusion of football history and recordings of the memories of ordinary supporters, the study of football is no longer solely concerned with the activities of players and managers but now takes into account the role of fans as well. This democratisation process is an important and innovative development in approaches to the study of sport and leisure.

General Note

Across the three publications, a total of almost 250 people were interviewed, generating 450,000 words which were recorded, transcribed and edited for publication.

With all interviews I was acutely aware of the surrounding ethical issues related to oral history interviews. In accordance with the recommendations of the Oral History Society, all interviewees were asked to sign a permission document. This document briefly outlined the intent of the interviewer and the publication. All interviewees agreed to the document. Where necessary I also respected any request for confidentiality although this happened on only rare occasions.

Of more ethical consideration was the transcribing of interviews. Again I followed the recommendations of the Oral History Society. Some dialect was corrected although no correction was made where I felt that it provided an insight into the character of the interviewee or added to the reader's enjoyment. I did however correct grammar so that the text was not only more readable but also comprehensible. I did attempt to show corrected text to the interviewees but this was not always possible. This fact had been referred to in the permission form which stated that it would not be an obligation. Where necessary I also made factual corrections to interviews. For example, if an interviewee referred to a specific football match but gave the wrong date to the game or the wrong scoreline, I made the necessary correction.

All interviews were transcribed by myself. This process, although time-consuming, allowed me to retain control, not only of the interviews, but also of the ethical issues outlined above. It meant that I could check for inaccuracies and was able to begin the process of editing as I went along.

My own journalistic experience, garnered over a 20 year period, proved to be invaluable. Interviewing techniques are only refined with time and experience and a long career as a journalist meant that I was able to ascertain with some degree of accuracy and certainty the structure of questioning and the importance of information being received. I was also able to remain silent and listen when I believed that it was necessary.

One of the principal reasons why I decided to use this technique of oral history was because of my experience of interviewing individuals over many years. As a journalist I was fully aware that it is comparatively easy to take an interview and extract whatever material is desired in order to establish a particular argument. The use of oral history however allows individuals to express themselves in a deliberately full and frank manner without fear of over-editing, excessive manipulation or time constraints.

Methodology

A Note on the Research and Editing of Interviews.

The Kop

As far as possible all efforts were made to abide by the advice of the Oral History Society on interviewing techniques. Interviews for The Kop were conducted during 1992 and 1993 and further updating interviews were conducted in 2004. In all more than 100 interviews were conducted and 90 of these were included in the publication. A total of around 150,000 words were recorded.

Interviews were recorded by three methods.

1. Taped interviews. These were face to face and taped. The earlier interviews were taped using a small cassette player. Later interviews used a Sony Minidisc recorder. Although taping interviews was the most desirable technique, events did not always allow for this. For instance some of the interviews took place in surroundings that did not encourage taping, such as at the ground itself on match days, or in public places, and so forth. Where ideally possible, interviews were conducted at either the interviewer's home or the interviewee's home or office. This encouraged the interviewee to relax and talk in a quiet and detailed way without undue interruption.

2. Written interviews. Where it was not possible to tape an interview, they were recorded in shorthand and longhand. There are however only a small number of these.

3. Telephone interviews. It was necessary to conduct a number of interviews over the telephone as, on occasion, it was impossible to meet face to face with some of the more well-known persons, particularly ex-players. These interviews were either recorded or taken down in shorthand.

Interviewees were selected on the basis of a number of criteria. Principal among these was their ability to discuss a particular historical period. Other criteria however involved their relevance to certain aspects governing the functioning of the Kop, such as cleaners, police, St John Ambulance, club directors. An early analysis of the interviews showed that it was also necessary to conduct interviews with individuals who had a relevance to issues being raised, such as hooliganism, fashion and song writing.

Interviewees were found through a variety of means. An advert was initially placed in the Liverpool Echo but this brought few responses. The most fruitful sources proved to be through the various supporters' clubs. The management of Liverpool Football Club was particularly helpful in identifying such sources. In particular the unofficial Liverpool Supporters' Club has premises (including a large bar) which functioned on match day proved to be a most productive network. Some interviewees also recommended their own acquaintances.

Once the interviews had been conducted they were immediately transcribed and then edited in order to extract the relevant comments. In most cases dialect was rewritten in order to make sense. Grammatical errors were generally left intact but where it was necessary to improve the sense of the sentence, they were corrected. In some cases factual mistakes have also been corrected; for instance where the interviewee has incorrectly given a score or date. These corrections followed the general policy of the Oral History Society dealing with ethical issues. Permission forms were also signed.

All questions have been edited out of the interviews. It was often the case that interviews covered a range of issues and historical periods. Where this happened the interviews were separated into the most appropriate chapters.

A full list of those interviewed is detailed later.

Red Voices

Interviews were conducted between 1996 and 2000. A total of 73 people were interviewed with 65 being included in the publication. More than 170,000 words were recorded.

The vast majority of interviews contained within this particular book were recorded on a Sony Minidisc player. Each interview was then transcribed and broken into sections to be included in the relevant chapters. As little editing as possible took place. Where editing has taken place it was carried out in order to make the interview as coherent and readable as possible. Hopefully the meaning has not been destroyed. Some slang and dialect words have been kept so that the reader can feel the character of the interviewee. The interviews however have not been included in full. Some repetitions and irrelevancies have been dropped. The occasional factual correction has also been made (dates, games, players, etc) in order to save any embarrassment to the interviewee and to avoid any confusion for the reader.

This book took a more general approach to football fandom. It did not concentrate on any particular area of the ground and nor did it attempt to interview individuals about the functioning of the club. The principal objective was to record the memories and experiences of fans since the 1920s. Consequently interviewees were principally selected on the basis of age and their relevance to a particular historical period of the club.

Particular efforts were made to record interviews with individuals whose experiences went back as far as the pre-war years. For obvious reasons it was clear that such interviews were of paramount importance. Events have shown that a number of those interviewed have subsequently died.

Drawing on my experiences as a journalist, the chairman of Manchester United, Mr Martin Edwards, was deliberately chosen for the first interview as I believed that this would help facilitate later interviews with players, fans and other club officials. I also drew upon my experience of The Kop, by selecting interviewees through various organisations such as fanzines, unofficial supporters' clubs, and the club itself.

The taped interviews are now in the possession of the football archive at the FIFA National Football Museum in Preston.

In as many cases as possible individuals were allowed to see their written interviews and to make corrections. Some individuals however declined the opportunity. A full list of the interviewees is detailed later.

The Boot Room Boys

Some 45 interviews are included in the book although a total of 51 interviews were recorded. These amounted to a total of 130,000 words. Interviews were conducted between 1998 and 1999.

The range of interviewees for this book is in contrast with the other publications. In this instance interviews have been conducted with a narrower range of personnel, concentrating on players, former players, members of the coaching staff and club directors. There are few interviews with fans. As a result interviewees tended to select themselves with my own knowledge of the club and its history of vital importance. There was clearly a limited number of coaching staff still available for interview, due to a number of factors, including death, illness and distance. I deliberately selected the club's secretary, Peter Robinson, as my initial interviewee due to his importance within the club's hierarchical structure, knowing that his agreement to an interview would facilitate further interviews. As a result the selection of interviewees and access to them was enhanced by the club. This was also due not only to the fact that the club had a 'friendly' relationship with myself and that the club also saw the publication as an important contribution to its history. The club was able to provide telephone numbers and was able to arrange access to its own employees. As a result the book contains interviews with almost everyone the author had sought.

Again, interviews were conducted along the lines recommended by the Oral History Society. All interviews were taped on a Sony minidisc player. Face to face taped interviews tended to be shorter in length as the author needed to be aware of the time demands being made on certain personnel, particularly the elderly and the more well known. A few telephone interviews took place. All of these were taped. Also included were some comments made in other publications. Generally these comments were restricted to those made by personnel no longer alive but who I believed added to the overall context of the book.

The taped interviews are now in the possession of the football archive at the FIFA National Football Museum in Preston. A full list of those interviewed is detailed later.

Bibliography

- Kelly, S. (1999) Red Voices: An Oral History of Manchester United. London, Headline.
 Kelly, S. (1999) The Boot Room Boys. London, Collins Willow.
 Kelly, S. (2005) The Kop: Liverpool's Twelfth Man, London, Virgin.
-

- Alcock, C. (1867) Football: Our Winter Game. London, Field.
 Andrews, D. ed. (2004) Manchester United: A Thematic Study, London, Routledge.
 Bale J. (1994) Landscape of Sport, Leicester, Leicester University Press.
 Bale, J (2003) Post- Colonialism and Sport, London, Berg.
 Barkow, A. (2000) Getting' to the Dance Floor. New York, Atheneum.
 Belchem, J. (2000) Merseypride: Essays in Liverpool Exceptionalism. Liverpool.
 Belchem, J. ed. (2006) Liverpool 800. Liverpool, LUP.
 Birley, D. (1995) Land of Sport and Glory. Manchester, MUP.
 Bose, M. (1990) Cricket Voices. London, Kingswood.
 Bose, M. (2007) Manchester Disunited: And the Business of Soccer, London, Aurum.
 Boyle, R. & Haynes, R. (2004) Football in the New Media Age, London, Routledge.
 Branson, N & Heinemann, M. (1971) Britain in the 1930s. London, Heinemann.
 Brown, A. ed. (1998) Fanatics, Power, Identity & Fandom in Football. London, Routledge.
 Burns, J. (2004) When Beckham Went to Spain: Power Stardom and Real Madrid. London, Michael Joseph.
 Butler, B. (1988) The Football League 1888-1988. London, Macdonald.
 Carter, N. (2006) The Football Manager. London, Routledge.
 Coleman, R. (2000) Lennon, the Definitive Biography. London, Pan.
 Cunningham H. (1980) Leisure in the Industrial Revolution. London, Palgrave.
 Davies, H. (1972) The Glory Game. London, Weidenfeld and Nicholson.
 De Lisle, T. (1995) Lives of the Great Songs. London, Penguin.
 Dohren, D. (2004) Ghost on the Wall. Edinburgh, Mainstream.
 Dragowki, J., Diethelm, K. & Watson, I. (1995) Alive and Kicking, Fussball Zwischen Deutschland und England. Bremen, Redaktion Gulliver.
 Dunning, E., Murphy, P. and Williams, J. (1988) The Roots of Football Hooliganism. London, Routledge.
 Dunphy, E. (1976) Only a Game. London, Kestrel.
 Dunphy, E. (1991) A Strange Kind of Glory, Sir Matt Busby and Manchester United. London, Heinemann.
 Evans, G.E. (1956) As The Fellow Who Cuts The Hay, London, Faber.
 Evans, G.E. (1970) Where Beards Wag All, London Faber.
 Fishwick, N. (1989) English Football and Society, Manchester, Manchester University Press.
 Garland, J., Malcolm, D. & Rowe, M. (2003) The Future of Football, London, Cass.
 Gibson, A. & Pickford, W. (1906) Association Football & the Men Who Made It. London, publisher unknown.
 Green, G. (1978) There's Only One United. London, Hodder and Stoughton.

- Guilianotti, R. Ed. (1994) Football, Violence and Social Identity, London, Routledge,
- Guilianotti, R. (2005) Sport: A Critical Sociology, London, Routledge,
- Holt, R. (1990) Sport and the British. Oxford, OUP.
- Hill, D. (1989) Out of His Skin. The John Barnes Phenomena. London, Faber.
- Hill, J. (2002) Sport, Leisure and Culture in 20th Century Britain. Basingstoke, Palgrave.
- Hill, J. & Williams, J. (1996) Sport and Identity in the North of England. Keele, Keele University Press.
- Hornby, N. (1992) Fever Pitch. London, Gollancz.
- Inglis, S. (1988) League Football And The Men Who Made It. London, Collins Willow.
- Inglis, S. (1996) The Football Grounds of Britain. London, Collins Willow.
- Jones, S. (1988) Sport, Politics & the Working Class. Manchester, MUP.
- Keates, T. (1929) History of Everton Football Club 1878-1929. London, Thomas Brakell.
- Kelly, S. (1987a) Idle Hands, Clenched Fists. Nottingham, Spokesman.
- Kelly, S. (1987b) You'll Never Walk Alone, The Official History of Liverpool Football Club. London, MacDonald.
- Kelly, S. (1988) Forever Everton, the Official History of Everton Football Club. London, Macdonalds.
- Kelly, S. (1992) Dalglish, London, Headline.
- Kelly, S. ed. (1992) A Game of Two Halves. London, Mandarin.
- Kelly, S. (1994) Souness, A Soccer Revolutionary. London, Headline.
- Kelly, S. (1995) Backpage Football. London, Macdonalds.
- Kelly, S. (1996a) Bill Shankly: It's Much More Important Than That. London, Virgin.
- Kelly, S. (1996b) Backpage United. London, Macdonalds.
- Kelly, S. (1997) Fergie, The Biography of Alex Ferguson. London, Headline.
- Kelly, S. (2003) Gerard Houllier, The Liverpool Revolution, London, Virgin.
- King, A. (2002) The End of the Terraces. London, Leicester University Press
- King, C. (2004) Offside Racism, London, Berg.
- Laclemence, P. (1998) Plus Jamais ! De Heysel à Sheffield. Paris, Blick.
- Lane, T. (1987) Liverpool: Gateway of Empire. London, Lawrence and Wishart.
- Lane, T. (1997) Liverpool City of the Sea. Liverpool, Liverpool University Press.
- Loverro, T. (2007) Hail Victory: An Oral History of the Washington Redskins, New York, Wiley
- McKinstry, L. (2003) Jack and Bobby. London, Collins Willow.
- Mailer, N. (1975) The Fight. London, Little Brown.
- Mariner, S. (1982) The Economic and Social Development of Merseyside. London, publisher unknown.
- Mason, T. (1980) Association Football and English Society, 1863-1915. Brighton, Harvester.
- Mason, T. (1985) The Blues and the Reds. Liverpool, Lancashire and Cheshire Historical Society.
- Mason, T. (1988) Sport in Britain. London, Faber & Faber.
- Ministry of Labour Report* (1932), Cmnd 4281, London, HMSO.
- McMillan, R. (2004) Us Against Them, London, Harper Collins
- Mellor, G. (1999) The Social and Geographical Make-up of Football Crowds in the North West of England, 1946-1962, The Sports Historian, Vol 19, No.2.

- Mellor, G. (Summer 2002) The Genesis of Manchester United as a National and International 'Super-Club', Soccer and Society, Vol 1, No.2
- Morris, D. (1981) The Soccer Tribe. London, Cape.
- Morrison, I. & Shury, A. (1992) Manchester United A Complete Record. Derby, Breedon.
- Morrow, S. (2003) The People's Game? London. Palgrave.
- Oral History, The Journal of the Oral History Society, Spring 1997, Vol 25. Taylor and Ward, Kicking and Screaming: Broadcasting Football Oral Histories; Gearing, B., More Than a Game: The Experience of Being a Professional Footballer in Britain.
- Newsham, G. (1997) The Dick, Kerr Ladies Football Club. London, Preston, Scarlett.
- Paisley, B. (1983) Bob Paisley: An Autobiography. London, Arthur Barker.
- Paul, D. (1998) Anfield Voices. Stroud, Tempus.
- Pead, B. (1986) Liverpool: A Complete Record. Derby, Breedon.
- Polley, M. (1988) Moving the Goalposts. London, Routledge.
- Redhead, S. (1991) Football with Attitude. Manchester, Ashgate.
- Redhead, S. (1997) Post-Fandom and the Millennial Blues. London, Routledge.
- Redhead, S., Hit and Tell, A Review Essay on the Soccer Hooligan Memoir, Soccer and Society, 5 (3). pp. 391-402. November 2004.
- Rollin, J. (1985) Soccer At War. London, Collins Willow.
- Ross, I. & Smailes, G. (1985) Everton, A Complete Record. Derby, Breedon.
- Royal, D & Wheat, J. (2005) Coach Royal, Texas, University of Texas
- Russell, D. (1997) Football and the English. Preston, Carnegie.
- Seddon, P. (1999) A Football Compendium. London, British Library.
- Shankly, B. (1976) Shankly, London Arthur Barker,
- Shaw, B. (1979) Cashel Byron's Profession. London, Penguin.
- Smailes, G. (1991) The Breedon Book of Football League Records. Derby, Breedon.
- Taylor, Rt Hon Lord Justice (1990) The Hillsborough Stadium Disaster 15 April 1989. Final Report Home Office, Cmnd 962. London, HMSO.
- Taylor, F. (1983) The Day A Team Died. London, Souvenir.
- Taylor, M. (2008) The Association Game, A History of British Football, London, Pearson.
- Taylor, R. (1992) Football and its Fans, Leicester, Leicester University Press.
- Taylor, R. & Ward A. (1993) Three Sides of the Mersey. London, Robson.
- Taylor, R. (1993) The Day of the Hillsborough Disaster. Liverpool, Liverpool University Press.
- Taylor, R. & Ward A. (1995) Kicking and Screaming: An Oral History of Football in England. London, Robson.
- Tyrrell, T. & Meek D. (1988) Manchester United the Official History. London, Guild.
- Wagg, S. (2004) British Football and Social Exclusion. London, Routledge.
- Waller, P. J. (1981) Democracy & Sectarianism, A Political and Social History of Liverpool, 1868-1939. Liverpool, Liverpool University Press.
- Walvin, J. (1975) The People's Game. Edinburgh, Mainstream.
- Watt, T. (1993) The End. Edinburgh, Mainstream.
- Watt, T. (1995) A Passion for the Game. Edinburgh, Mainstream.
- Williams, J. & Wagg, S., eds. (1991) British Football and Social Change. Leicester, Continuum.

- Williams, J., Dunning, E. & Murphy, P., (1989) Hooligans Abroad. London, Routledge.
- Williams, J., Hopkins, S. & Long, C. (2001) Passing Rhythms, Liverpool FC and the Transformation of Football. Oxford, Berg.
- Wood, F. (1867) Beeton's Football. London, Frederick Warne.
- Young, P. (1963) Football on Merseyside. London, Soccer Book Club.
- Young, P. (1950) Football: Facts and Fancies or the Art of Spectatorship. London, Dennis Dobson.
- Young, P. (1951) The Appreciation of Football. London, Dennis Dobson.

Newspapers, Magazines and Fanzines

Athletic News
Daily Telegraph
Guardian
Independent
Liverpool Daily Post
Liverpool Echo
Liverpool Football Echo
Oral History, Journal of the Oral History Society
Manchester Evening News
Mersey Beat
Sport, Leisure and Culture in 20th Century Britain
Sporting Chronicle
The Sports Historian
Through The Wind and Rain
United We Stand
When Saturday Comes

List of Interviewees

The Kop

John Aldridge, Former Liverpool player

Jeff Anderson, Fan and television producer.

Steve Anderson, Fan and former network current affairs editor ITV

Phil Aspinall, Fan

Bob Azurdia, BBC Radio Merseyside Broadcaster

Geoffrey Banfield,

Michael Banfield,

Robert Banfield,

Gordon Banks, Former Stoke, Leicester City and England goalkeeper

Eric Barnsley, Fan

Brian Bird,

Alan Bleasdale, Liverpool-born Playwright

Billy Butler, BBC Radio Merseyside Broadcaster

Steve Cain,

Andrew Cashin, Businessman and secretary of the Toronto Liverpool fan club

James Catling, Cleaner, Liverpool Football Club

John Chadwick, Fan

Dave Clay, Fan.

Ray Clemence, Former Liverpool and England goalkeeper

Kenny Dalglish, Former Liverpool and Scotland player, and manager of Liverpool

Stanley Doig, Fan and son of Liverpool goalkeeper Ned Doig.

Wendy Doig, Fan.

Dr John Doyle, Academic

George Edwards

Leslie Edwards, Former Sports Editor Liverpool Daily Post and Echo

Roy Evans, Former Liverpool player and manager

David Fairclough, Former Liverpool player

Alex Finlason, Architect and fan

John Frank

Jim Gardiner, Fan.

Wayne Gordon, Fan

Harry Gough,

Mick Graham,

Bob Greaves, Former television presenter and sports reporter.

Jim Hartley,

Steve Heighway, former Liverpool player

Jim Hesketh, Former police officer

Gill Holroyd, Fan

Emlyn Hughes, Former Liverpool and England captain.

John Jeffrey

Pat Jennings, Former Tottenham, Arsenal and Northern Ireland goalkeeper.

Judith Jones, Fan.

Tony Jones, Fan.
Paul Kelly, Fan.
Alan Kennedy, Former Liverpool and England player.
Johnny Kennedy, Broadcaster Radio City.
Andrei Kissilev, Moscow Spartak fan.
Brian Labone, Former Everton and England player.
Denis Law, Former Manchester United, Manchester City and Scotland player.
Mark Lawrenson, Former Liverpool and Ireland player.
Harry Leather, Fan.
Bob Lyons, Fan
Eileen McAuley, Fan.
William McIntyre, BBC journalist and fan
Duncan McKenzie, Former Everton player.
Tommy McKinlay, Fan
Yvonne McLeod, Fan
John Mapson, Fan
Gerry Marsden, Lead singer Gerry and the Pacemakers
Neil Midgeley, Former Football League referee.
Charlie Mitten, Former Manchester United and England player
Denis Mooney, Fan and television producer
Steve Morgan, Businessman, former shareholder and fan
Sydney Moss, Former Vice Chairman, Liverpool Football Club.
Joe Murray, Local businessman and fan
Rob Noble, Fan
Billy O'Donnell, Fan.
Hugh O'Neil, St John Ambulance.
Ron Pawsey, Fan
Jack Payne, Fan.
Richard Pedder, Fan
Keith Richards, Fan
Gareth Roberts, Fan
Ted Robbins, Comedian, writer and fan
Sandy Ross, Fan and Television Producer. Managing Director Scottish Television
Ian St John, Former Liverpool and Scotland player.
Jeff Scott, Fan.
Ian Sergeant, Policed Constable, Merseyside Police
Steve Shakeshaft, Photographer Liverpool Daily Post and Echo.
George Shannon, Fan
The Rt. Rev David Sheppard, Former Bishop of Liverpool, Sheila Spears, Fan.
John Stile, Fan
Albert Stubbins, Former Liverpool player.
Bernard Swift, Former police officer
Rogan Taylor, Fan, writer and academic
Andrew Thomas, Judge and fan.
Ian Thomson,

Phil Thompson, Former Liverpool player and former Assistant manager.

Louise Tovey, Fan.

Bob Tweeddale, Fan

Rev Jackie Waterman, Local vicar, Anfield.

Professor Roger Webster, Academic and fan

Barry Wilford, Fan.

Dr John Williams, Fan and academic

Billy Wilson, Fan and BBC journalist

Harry Wilson, Fan

Linda Winrow, Fan.

Dave Woods, BBC radio five commentator

Lennie Woods, Fan

Others interviewed for more general and historical information include:

Bill Gilson of architects Atherden Fuller

The editors and publishers of Kop magazine

The staff of the microfilm department of Liverpool Central Library, Norman Whibbly of the Liverpool City Council Surveyors department

Steve Shakeshaft, photographer, the Liverpool Daily Post and Echo

Liverpool Supporters Club and in particular Ted Morris and Richard Pedder, Manchester Central Library,

Roger Hughes of Radio Merseyside,

Merseyside Police Force and especially Inspector Bernard Swift who allowed me to spend a Saturday watching a game from the police control room,

The St John Ambulance Brigade and Hugh O'Neill

The editor, Through The Wind And Rain

Ivor Rolands for his song collection.

List Interviewees

Red Voices

It should be noted that a number of these interviewees have died since they were interviewed.

Adam Brown,

Former, member of the Football Supporters Association and the Football Task Force. He is also research officer at the Institute for Popular Culture at Manchester Metropolitan University

Alan Durrans,

Born in Manchester and started supporting United in the fifties. Once had a trial with the club.

Albert Thorpe.

Former journalist covering Manchester United. First watched United in the early 1920s.

Alf Davies

Member of the St John Ambulance Brigade since 1935. First saw United in 1928 and regularly watched them when they were in the second division before the War

Alisson Thornton

Accountant. Born in the north east but converted to United while at university in Manchester

Andy Mitten

Founder and editor of the United fanzine United We Stand

Barney Chilton

Former editor of the Fanzine Red News.

Barry Moorhouse

Club membership secretary who has seen membership increase from 40,000 to 140,000 in ten years.

Sir Bobby Charlton.

Former Manchester United player. Now a club director

Bob Greaves

Former journalist with the Daily Mail at the time of the Munich disaster. He subsequently became a television presenter with Granada Television.

Brian Kidd

Former player and assistant manager at Old Trafford.

Cliff Butler.

Former editor of the United programme United Review and a lifelong United fan.

Danny McGregor

Born in Moss Side and supported the club as a young boy after the War. Was the club's commercial manager overseeing a massive growth in business.

David Meek

Journalist given the task of covering United when the Manchester Evening News' football correspondent was killed in the Munich air disaster. He retired in May 1995 after 35 years service with the paper.

David Menasche

Owns a small temporary staffing agency in San Jose, close to San Francisco but still supports United from afar, usually via the internet but makes the occasional trip to Old Trafford.

George Reynolds

Fifty-three year old shopkeeper in Chorlton who has rarely watched United since the Munich disaster, a tragedy which still upsets greatly him.

Derek Wynne

Former full time professional player with Port Vale but then became an academic.

Eamon Holmes

Presenter of GMTV. Born in Belfast

Graham Stringer

Former leader of Manchester City Council, 1984-96, and has been Labour MP for Manchester Blackley since 1997.

Hugh Jones

Founder of Jones Executive Coaches and former first team coach driver.

Ian Moss

Former policeman and now county manager of the St John Ambulance Brigade.

James Thornton

An accountant living in Bolton. Born in Colchester but began supporting United at an early age. Came to university in Manchester solely in order to watch United. Married to Alisson Thornton.

Joe Dillon

Retired shopkeeper who started supporting United before the War. Saw his first game in 1937.

Johnny Morris.

United player born in Radcliffe. Joined United as a fifteen year old shortly before the War. Served in the army during the war but returned to Old Trafford for the 1946/47 season. A lightly-built inside forward he was a cup winner the following season but then left the club following a disagreement with Matt Busby in early 1949, joining derby County for a record fee of £24,500. Capped three times by England. A total of 92 appearances for United with 35 goals.

Judith Swift

Began supporting United as a schoolgirl in the 1970s

Ken Hastings

Retired Government Education Inspector, now living in Cambridge. Although he was born in Gainsborough, his father had become a United supporter after regularly watching them play Gainsborough Trinity at the turn of the century. Passed his love of United on to his son.

Kevin McAleny

Born on Merseyside but became a fan of the Busby Babes when he was young and has remained a United fan all his life . Once had a trial with United.

Laurence Cassidy

Lifelong United fan who played for the club between 1947-52. Played mainly in the reserves, making only four appearances in the first team. Later became a teacher, and then headmaster at St Patrick's school in Collyhurst and was responsible for feeding a number of players towards Old Trafford including Brian Kidd.

Leon Swerling

Solicitor and lifelong United supporter with vivid memories of the European Cup final.

Les Olive

Appointed assistant secretary in 1942 and took over as secretary of United immediately after the Munich disaster when Walter Crickmer was killed. Retired in 1988 and was a director of the club. Played twice for the first team during the early fifties as a goalkeeper.

Martin Edwards

Son of Louis Edwards the former United chairman. Martin Edwards became chairman of the club in 1992. In September 1998 he agreed to the takeover of United by SKY Television. Later and sold his personal stake in the club, valued at £80 million.

Matthew Reynolds

Much travelled around Europe in support of United.

Maxine Dunham

Travelled extensively following United around Europe with more than a few escapades. Was imprisoned in Turkey when she went to see United play Galatasaray

Pat MacDonald

Fan

Michael Dunham

Accountant and a United supporter since the War. Vivid memories of the 1948 FA Cup final.

Paul Windridge

Brought up in a rugby household but was finally forced to confess his allegiance to football and United. Is the creative director in graphic design business.

Pete Holland

Born in West Gorton but emigrated to the United States in 1977, shortly after he had invaded the pitch, flairs and all, following Denis Law's famous goal that plunged United into the Second Division.

Robin Murray

Although born in Portsmouth Robin Murray became a United supporter at school. He travelled regularly to Old Trafford on his motorbike before eventually joining the Greater Manchester Police, a decision not wholly unconnected with his support of United.

Roger Hennell

Chartered Surveyor.

Roland Coburn

Film editor at Granada Television. Lifelong United fan who has travelled the length and breadth of Europe in support of United.

Sally Orpin

Member of the Manchester United Supporters' Club in Victoria, Australia. Has lived in Australia for five years.

Simon Jones

Drives the first team coach. Also managing director of Jones Executive Coaches.

Simon Thorp

Chorlton based writer who remembers the second division days with affection and a few far distant flung places where he watched them.

Stan Orme.

Now Lord Orme. Was Labour MP for Salford West between 1964-83 and for Salford East between 1983-97. Held various Cabinet posts including Minister of State for Northern Ireland 1974-76 and Secretary of State for Social Security.

Teresa Hennell

Solicitor and Season ticket holder who now cycles to Old Trafford from their home in Didsbury.

Tim Bamford

A research officer with the Shopworkers Union, USDAW.

Warren Bradley

Winger who joined the club from Bishop Auckland immediately after the Munich disaster. Died 2007.

Wilf McGuinness

Busby Babe, born in Manchester, who missed the trip to Munich through injury. He was also forced to retire early through injury. At the age of 31 he was appointed successor to Matt Busby but was sacked after 18 months.

Wilf Sudlow

Seventy-six year old former deputy head of St Ambrose School in Manchester. Began keeping a United scrap book in the fifties which today is a fascinating collection of photos and information covering 40 years of United's history.

Christopher Ecclestone.

Salford born actor. Starred in the films Jude the Obscure and Elizabeth I as well as the highly regarded BBC production Our Friends in the North.

Gary Rhodes

Television Chef who became a United fan after his family moved to Cheadle.

Sean Wilson

Actor. Coronation Street's Martin Platt.

Diane Modhal.

Olympic athlete

Rudi Kidd.

Forty-three year old black solicitor who over the years came face to face with racism on the terraces and decided there was only way to combat it. Now a lawyer representing media clients.

Denis Law

Joined Manchester United for a record fee from Torino in July 1962.

Shay Brennan

Swept to stardom following the Munich Disaster when he made his debut in the first match after the air crash, against Sheffield Wednesday.

Norman Whiteside.

Played 254 games for United either in the midfield or upfront, scoring 67 goals.

Transferred to Everton in August 1989 but retired two years later due to injury. Now a podiatrist, working mainly with lower league football clubs.

Bill Foulkes.

United defender, 1952-70. Busby Babe who survived Munich air disaster and went on to win a European Cup medal. Played 679 games for United, scoring nine goals.

List of Interviewees

The Boot Room Boys

John Aldridge.

Former player who went on to score 50 goals in 83 league games before leaving in September 1989 to join Real Sociedad. Capped more than 60 times by the Republic of Ireland.

John Bennett.

Joined Liverpool as a schoolboy during the 1961/61 season. Played A team and reserve team football but never making it to the first team.

John Bennison.

Former coach. Worked particularly with the young players. Now retired

Mike Berry.

Runs a marketing, publicity and promotions company in Liverpool and has organised the testimonials of a number of former Liverpool players. Liverpool fan since the 1950s.

Alan Brown.

Lifelong Liverpool fan. One of his first games was the 1950 FA Cup final.

Gordon Burns.

Well known television presenter and producer who used to produce Granada Television's football coverage. Later became presenter of the Krypton Factor and is now presenter of BBC Television's Look North West.

Phil Chisnall.

The only player to have been transferred directly between Manchester United and Liverpool since the 1930s. Has the rare distinction of having played under both Shankly and Busby.

Ian Callaghan.

Liverpool midfielder of the 1960s. Played a record 800 plus games for the club in all competitions with 69 goals. England international who played in the 1966 World Cup finals.

Kenny Dalglish.

Joined the club from Celtic in August 1977 for a record £440,000. Went on to win every honour in the game as well as 102 caps for Scotland. Became player/manager of Liverpool in May 1985 following the Heysel disaster but shocked the football world when he quit in February 1991, claiming that the pressures had become too great.

Roy Evans.

An apprentice with Liverpool he played just a handful of games before Bob Paisley persuaded him to join the coaching staff. Went into the bootroom to help mastermind domestic and European successes. Appointed manager after Graeme Souness left the club but quit in November 1998.

David Fairclough.

Fomer player who will always be remembered for the dramatic impact he made when he came on against St Etienne in the European Cup quarter finals of 1977. Played 88 times for Liverpool plus 62 appearances as a sub, scoring 52 goals before leaving to play his football in Switzerland and Belgium. Now a media pundit.

Jim Gardiner.

One of Liverpool's most dedicated fans who has seen virtually every Liverpool game home and away throughout the world since the mid 1970s.

Bob Greaves.

Was for more than 30 years a presenter with Granada Television. He was also a regular match reporter with the Mail on Sunday, a job which took him to Anfield on numerous occasions.

Alan Hansen.

Joined Liverpool from Partick Thistle in 1977 and went on to win just about every honour in the game. Now a media pundit with BBC Television's Match of the Day.

Steve Hale.

Well known freelance Liverpool photographer. Also the author of a number of illustrated books on Liverpool.

Brian Hall.

University educated midfielder with the successful Shankly team of the 1970s. Won FA Cup, league and UEFA honours before leaving in 1976. Later went into teaching but is now back at Anfield as Community Development Officer.

Ian Hargreaves.

Former sports editor of The Liverpool Daily Post and Echo. Covered Liverpool as sports journalist for most of the years of the club's great success and befriended a host of Liverpool managers.

Barrie Holmes.

Liverpool supporter since the 1960s Helped set up the International Supporters club and was secretary of the Merseyside branch for some years.

Gerard Houllier.

Former Liverpool manager. Also former manager of Lens, Paris St Germain and France. Was technical director for France when they won the World Cup in 1998. Joined Liverpool as joint manager with Roy Evans that summer but became manager in November 1998 when Evans left.

Emlyn Hughes.

Liverpool and England captain of the 1970s.

Roger Hunt.

The leading league goalscorer in Liverpool's history with a total of 245 league goals between 1959 and 1969. Also scored a record 41 league goals in the 1961-62 season. Won League and cup honours with Liverpool plus 34 England caps and a World Cup winners medal.

Joey Jones.

Joined Liverpool from Wrexham in July 1975 and played just three seasons, winning European Cup and league honours before returning to Wrexham. Later played for Chelsea. Won 72 caps for Wales. Now on the coaching staff at Wrexham.

Alan Kennedy.

The man who scored the winning penalty in the European Cup final against Roma and the winning goal against Real Madrid. Bob Paisley paid a record fee for a fullback when he signed Kennedy from Newcastle in 1978.

Chris Lawler.

Liverpool born fullback who joined Liverpool as a schoolboy in 1960. Played under Bill Shankly, winning cup and league honours as well as four England caps.

Tommy Lawrence.

Liverpool goalkeeper of the 1960s.

Mark Lawrenson.

One of the finest central defenders in Liverpool's history. A £900,000 signing from Brighton in 1981 who went on to win European and domestic honours. Capped 31 times by the Republic of Ireland. Had a brief spell as manager of Oxford United and now media pundit, still partnering Alan Hansen on Match of the Day.

Sammy Lee.

Joined Liverpool as an apprentice in 1975 and made his debut in 1978. Won European, league and cup honours before leaving to join QPR in August 1986. Capped 14 times by England. Found his way back to Liverpool as a coach under Graeme Souness.

Alec Lindsay.

Liverpool fullback of the 1970s who joined the club from Bury. Won FA Cup, League and UEFA honours with Liverpool as well as four England caps. Left Liverpool in 1977 to join Stoke.

Lawrie McMenemy.

Former Sunderland and Southampton manager. Great admirer of all things Liverpool and a regular visitor to the boot room during his days with Southampton.

Willie Miller.

Lifelong Liverpool fan who helped set up and now runs the Liverpool FC Former Players' Association.

Jan Molby.

Danish international midfielder signed from Dutch club Ajax in August 1984.

Ronnie Moran.

Joined Liverpool in 1949 as a schoolboy amateur, turning professional in 1952. Played 379 games, mainly as a fullback until 1965 when he joined the coaching staff. Had a brief stint as acting manager, retired 1998 after 49 years service.

Steve Morgan.

Liverpool born multi-millionaire former chairman of Redrow Homes. Also life-long Liverpool supporter and at one time one of the largest shareholders in the club.

Phil Neal.

One of the most honoured players in the game. Bob Paisley's first signing in October 1974, went on to play more than 600 games for the club. Had subsequent spells as manager of Bolton Wanderers, Coventry City and Manchester City and also worked with the England squad under Graham Taylor.

Bob Paisley.

The most successful manager in the history of British football. Liverpool player 1939 to 1954 before taking up a coaching position at the club. Became manager following the resignation of Bill Shankly in 1974. Retired 1983 and became a club director. Died 1996.

Rick Parry.

Chief Executive Liverpool Football Club. Formerly Chief Executive of the Premier League and before that an accountant.

Peter Robinson.

Secretary of Liverpool since 1965. Later a director of the club and executive vice chairman. Over the years one of the most important and influential people in the history of the club. Retired.

Ian Ross.

Joined Liverpool in 1966 and went on to play just over 50 games for the club before joining Aston Villa. Had stints as a manager with a variety of clubs including Huddersfield Town. Now a publican at Timperely in Manchester.

Ian Rush.

Former player. The club's leading overall goalscorer.

Ian St John.

Scottish international striker signed from Motherwell in May

Tom Saunders.

Former head teacher in Liverpool who joined the coaching staff in 1970. Later a director of the club.

Bill Shankly.

Legendary Liverpool manager and without a doubt the most important single figure in the club's history. Became manager in December 1959. Sensationally quit the club in the summer of 1974 after winning the FA Cup and went into retirement. Died September 1981.

Tommy Smith.

Former Liverpool captain who scored in the 1977 European Cup final, to help Liverpool win the trophy. Had a brief spell on the coaching staff.

Graeme Souness.

Former player signed from Middlesbrough in January 1978. Later appointed manager.

Willie Stevenson.

Former player who joined Liverpool in 1962. Won FA Cup and league honours with Liverpool before leaving in 1967 to join Stoke City.

Phil Thompson.

Former Liverpool and England captain. Later appointed assistant manager.