Be a mighty oak to a young acorn.

Making a successful transition from Bryant College into the business world requires preparedness and career planning. The Office of Career Services at Bryant College sponsors an innovative program called the Alumni Career Network. The network is composed of Bryant alumni involved in programs designed to help students prepare for their future. With a variety of options to choose from, you can become involved in:

Careers in... Series: Return to campus to speak to students about your career in...and to share your experiences.

Telephone interviews: An over-the-phone source of information for students who have questions about a particular career field.

Student visitations: Meet with students at your place of employment to answer questions students have about your career field.

You have the experience and expertise that Bryant students need. Interested? Simply fill out and return the form below to: Office of Career Services, Bryant College, 450 Douglas Pike, Smithfield, RI, 02917-1284. Join the Alumni Career Network—mighty oaks helping young acorns grow.

Virginia Floyd honored by faculty as first "Professor of the Year"

Dr. Virginia Floyd, professor of English, has been selected by her peers to receive the College's first "Professor of the Year" award. Presented during National Higher Education week, held October 19-26, the award is based on the quality of a professor's contributions in the areas of community, classroom, and scholarship.

A faculty member at Bryant since 1971, Floyd is recognized as one of the world's foremost authorities on the works of Eugene O'Neill. She has written three books on the American playwright: Eugene O'Neill: A World View, Eugene O'Neill at Work: Newly Released Ideas for Plays, and The Plays of Eugene O'Neill: A New Assessment.

Floyd was the first scholar permitted to study the dramatist's working notebooks and sketches, bequeathed to Yale University more than 25 years ago. Her interest in O'Neill has taken her as far away as Hungary to work with scholars from the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia, Poland, and East Germany. Floyd is Floyd holds an undergraduate degree from Our Lady of Cincinnati, and advanced degrees from Xavier University and Fordham University. Before coming to Bryant, she taught at Blessed Sacrament College and Paterson State College.

New Bryant College logo unites history and the future

The new year has seen the arrival and implementation of a new logo for Bryant College. In conjunction with strategic planning and an increasingly complex marketing strategy to promote Bryant College, the logo reflects Bryant's history - by retaining the archway concept which unites the old and new campuses - and a contemporary look which characterizes today's campus and Bryant's ambitious ten-year plan.

The new logo will retire the lower case "b" which has been in use since the 1970s. C. Ralph Adler, director of publications and advertising, said that a number of factors encouraged the administration to commission the design of a new logo. "Bryant's strategic plan and the new energies going into it called for a new symbol," he said. "And there have been problems with the 'b' logo - many people do not recognize it as a 'b', and the symbol is not unique to this institution. It also has a dated look to it. Since Bryant is at the forefront of creative strategic planning, it can't afford to have a logo that looks dated."

The logo features an outline of the traditional archway using horizontal bars of varying thickness. The logotype, with the name of the College, is Times, a traditional typeface which will tie Bryant to its historic roots, Adler said.

The new logo will help identify Bryant advertising wherever it appears, even though diverse programs - such as the Center for Management Development and the Small Business Development Center - are being advertised. New stationery and business cards will begin appearing in January with the symbol, and gradually throughout late winter the logo will appear on all College publications and advertisements.

The official College seal, featuring the words Bryant College, ellipsoid globe, quill, and flame of knowledge, along with the motto "Educando Dirigere Mercaturam," has not changed, Adler said. The seal will still be used on official documents of an historic or commemorative nature, such as diplomas.

Fall convocation features Norton survey of economic trends

Dr. Pat Norton addresses Bryant's first fall Convocation audience.

Dr. Pat Norton, Sarkisian professor of business economics, was the main speaker at Bryant's first fall convocation. His October 16 presentation was his inaugural campus-wide address. Students, faculty, administrators, and trustees attended the event, which will be repeated in subsequent years as an official opening to new academic sessions.

The convocation is a formal ceremony with academic officers and other special guests dressing in traditional robes, entering the convocation in a procession and following a program which includes an invocation, official remarks from the President and other dignitaries, and a recessional. Norman Sarkisian '53, whose donation established the Sarkisian professorship, brought his remarks and introduced Norton to the audience.

Norton's address included a fast-paced survey of the trends and developments which are affecting local, national, and international economies. Part of his responsibilities includes delivering speeches to the public, in addition to teaching a special graduate course on the Rhode Island economy, conducting research, writing grant proposals, helping to develop Bryant's economics curriculum, and creating special seminars to bring the business community to the Bryant campus.

Within the economics department, he is also looking to establish an institute to create and operate a computer-simulated model of Rhode Island's economy, and to issue periodic updates on its condition.

$100,000 Champlin grant to furnish mobile computer lab

The Champlin Foundations have awarded Bryant College a grant of $100,000 which will equip a mobile microcomputer laboratory to be used by the Center for Management Development. The Center has offered growing services in instruction on microcomputers, and the mobile lab will allow the Center to provide on-site training programs. This approach to microcomputer training will be more cost effective for businesses who have a number of employees being trained.

The proposal includes 25 portable microcomputers, one large video monitor, five printers, related hardware and software, and a van for transporting equipment to instructional sites.

Twenty-six percent of current Center for Management Development course and seminar enrollees are in microcomputer and software programs and the demand is increasing. The Center also contracts with individual companies to provide microcomputer training for executives and managers.

The mobile lab is part of a proposed Computer Applications Learning Center, which includes as its components a stationary microcomputer lab with 25 PC stations and related equipment, the expansion of Small Business Development Center service to small businesses by fifty clients in computer consultancies, and the development of an instructional team which can teach the basics of microcomputers in a variety of learning situations. The entire package is expected to cost over $600,000 when fully funded.

How to help ring in an $800,000 goal

Enjoy talking on the phone, especially with people with whom you have things in common? In February and March, you can join people like Bob Danielson '67, Nancy Jefferson '78, Jim McHugh '68, Vin Deignan '31, Paul Mastrianni '85, Erin Moore '85, Eleanor Read '52, and Helen Bochenek '34 who have volunteered already this year on Bryant Fund phonothons.

The spring phonothons are set for February 9 - 12, 18 - 20, and 23 - 27, and March 2 - 4. Volunteers will be calling alumni to encourage them to participate in this year's Bryant Fund, A Resource for Quality. With a second year of strategic planning now complete (see the "Presidential Perspective" in this issue), alumni support for computers, academic enhancement, financial aid, and the construction of the Bryant Center and the new dormitory is even more important.

This year's phonothon chairpersons, Bill DiBiasio '79 MBA and Richard Carriere '82, encourage all alumni to volunteer an evening to call fellow alums, talk about Bryant, and make a contribution to the Bryant Fund.

Learning how Bryant does it: Eleven foreign educators visit

Educators from many foreign countries toured Bryant to get a sense of its mission and procedures.

Bryant College was one stop in a month-long international exchange program titled "Academia and the Corporate World." In late November, educators from 11 foreign countries toured Bryant to get a better understanding of its linkages with the corporate community.

Coordinated by the Academy for Educational Development under auspices of the U.S. Information Agency, the program introduced these educators to America's educational and economic sectors and their growing collaboration.

A highlight of the day's visit was an introduction to the College's nationally recognized Center for Management Development. The Small Business Development Center was also examined, as well as undergraduate and graduate programs (such as internships) which link Bryant and the business world.

The educators stayed for five days in the New England area and also visited Harvard, Northeastern, and the Digital Equipment Corporation.

Countries represented were Ecuador, Mexico, Hungary, Egypt, Ireland, the Phillipines, Nicaragua, Peru, Sri Lanka, the Dominican Republic, and the United Kingdom. All of the participants are educational and economic policy leaders from higher education, national ministries of education, and public and private sector training institutions that are responsible for the development of partnerships between colleges and corporations and the training of managers.

They also visited Washington, D.C., New York, San Francisco, and Phoenix on their visit to America.

Fair makes access to business assistance easier

A survey last year indicated that Rhode Island business men and women wanted one thing more than any other: information on how to make their endeavors more successful.

Despite the dozens of organizations - governmental and educational - which make it their business to offer this kind of information, the general public is often confused about where to go to solve a particular problem.

The Rhode Island Lieutenant Governor's Office, along with Bryant's Small Business Development Center, the U.S. Small Business Administration, and the Rhode Island Department of Economic Development, made it much easier by bringing all of these organizations together under one roof in November. Over 200 concerned business people visited the Small Business Fair and went away with a clearer idea of who does what.

Among the participants were the SBDC, Bryant's Center for Management Development, the Brown Venture Forum, the U.S. Commerce Department, Rhode Island College, the Community College of Rhode Island, and over a dozen chambers of commerce from Rhode Island cities and towns.

In addition to hundreds of free brochures and reports, free audits from the Federal Energy Program and free consulting on business plans were available.

Lieutenant Governor Richard Licht welcomed the participants and guests, and John Motley, director of federal legislation for the Federation of Independent Business, spoke on national tax reform issues.

The fair, billed as "a wealth of information," was held in Bryant's Multipurpose Activities Center.

Public forums to examine religion in relation to public policy

How do religious beliefs impact on the legal questions involved in abortion? Prayer in school? Federal aid to religious schools?

The appropriate role between religious beliefs and this type of public policy issue will be the focus of a month-long series of public forums scheduled at Bryant this spring. Professors William Hill and Joan Marsella are responsible for coordinating the program, funded by a grant they received from the Rhode Island Committee for the Humanities, a state program of the National Endowment for the Humanities, and Bryant College.

Titled "God and Government: On the Appropriate Role between Religious Beliefs and Public Policy," the purpose of the series is to explore the role of religion in the formulation and justification of public policy in the United States. The forums will focus on the philosophical and legal principles which have historically been used to define this relationship, as well as on current debates raising significant questions about this traditional relationship.

Distinguished speakers and panelists will attempt to present a wide and varied number of perspectives on this question, from conservative to liberal to humanistic points of view. It's all to increase public awareness and understanding.

Participants include Robert F. Drinan, S.J., professor of law at Georgetown University Law Center and author of Religion, The Courts and Public Policy; former Governor J. Joseph Garrahy; Edwin B. Firmage, professor of law at University of Utah College of Law and former bishop and high councilman for Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (and a descendant of Brigham Young); Steven Brown, RI Chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union; Dr. Paul Kurtz, professor of philosophy at the State University of New York at Buffalo and editor of Free Inquiry magazine; and Cal Thomas, vice-president and national spokesman for the Moral Majority organization.

Each of the four forums planned for mid-March to mid-April is free and open to the public. All will be held in Bryant's Janikies Auditorium. For further information on this series, contact the Office of Public Information at (401) 232-6120 or Dr. William Hill at (401) 232-6237.

New agenda for "Weekend in New England"

Nothing succeeds like success, and Bryant's annual Parents' Weekend is no exception. The Weekend in New England was again a highlight among the College's fall activities. More than 2,500 students and their parents attended the program, held October 18-20 and coordinated by the Bryant College Student Senate. Guy Giantonio '86 served as chairman of the event.

In an effort to improve the perennial favorite, this year marks the first time that the weekend's agenda has included significant educational components as well as the traditional mix of social activities. According to Leslie L. Lafond, vice-president for student affairs, these components were designed to promote greater interaction between parents and the College's faculty and staff. It is hoped that they will become a regular fixture of Parents' Weekend.

Those items new to the agenda this year included two panel presentations and a presidential address from Dr. William T.

O'Hara. The presentations featured Dr. William Haas, professor of humanities, who spoke on the subject of business ethics, and Dr. Edward J. Golden, dean of student life, who addressed the topic of student life at Bryant.

President O'Hara's remarks concerned the state of the College at what he termed a "most interesting, critical, challenging time in higher education."

"Too many colleges and universities have no clear sense of their educational mission," he said, "and no concept of what graduates of their institutions ought to know or be."

The weekend also offered a variety of entertainment, including an arts and crafts fair, music, dance, and sports demonstrations. Students performing in Dance Club and Karate Club were featured.

Nine schools accept the challenge at Bryant

In what may become a new tradition in Thanksgiving season competition, nine Rhode Island and Massachusetts high schools sent teams to Bryant College on November 16 in hopes of winning the Bryant Challenge.

This challenge wasn't played out on a football field, but in an imaginary corporate boardroom, as teams of high school students matched wits in a computer-simulated game. The object of the game was to make successful management decisions for a fictitious company.

The purpose of the game was not only to exercise the business skills of high school students, but to introduce some of the region's brightest students with a leaning towards business to Bryant, its environment, and the kind of challenge a college student can expect.

The IMAGINIT business software package was the basis for the competition. Five students and one faculty advisor on each team went through a series of steps during the day to reach solutions to management problems. All nine teams gathered at points during the day to coordinate their data and compare results.

The day's activities were coordinated by Ron Di Battista, assistant professor of management and a new member of the Bryant faculty. Among the schools represented were Smithfield, Bishop Hendricken, and Barrington High Schools, and LaSalle Academy.

Interspersed through the day were assemblies featuring the faculty members of the management and computer information systems departments. President William T. O'Hara greeted the teams and initiated the game.

In addition to having fun with the program and meeting the Bryant students who were assigned to assist, the participants also had "a real educational challenge," said DiBattista. The faculty advisors for each team asked about the possibility of returning next year, and Di Battista said he is looking into expanding the program to include more teams.

The winners in the first Bryant Challenge: Barrington High School took first place, Tollgate High second, and Smithfield High third.

The winning team took home an IBM PCjr., donated by The F.H. French Company and presented by company president Henry J. Keigwin. A.T. Cross Company also honored the participants with pens.

Satellite beams computer seminar into Bryant

For one day in early November the Bryant landscape had a new feature - a satellite dish set up between the Unistructure and the Multipurpose Activities Center which received a signal beamed nationwide by Texas Instruments.

Bryant served as host for the satellite symposium on artificial intelligence which was attended here by 60 individuals who work in the computer field. By accepting the satellite signal for viewing by these local experts, Bryant became part of a huge "electronic classroom" which included other colleges, corporations, government agencies, and independent research laboratories across the country.

The symposium was shown on a screen 10 feet across, which is now part of Bryant's audio-visual equipment.

"Knowledge-based Systems and Their Applications" was the official title of the seven hour symposium, which focused on knowledge-based, or expert, systems. Speakers included Edward Feigenbaum and Bruce Buchanan, both of Stanford University; Randall Davis, a researcher on artificial intelligence who is based at MIT, and Mark Fox, head of the intelligent systems lab of the Robotics Institute of Carnegie-Mellon University.

Dr. Thomas Burke, professor of computer information systems, coordinated the event at Bryant.

BRYANT ATHLETIC HALL OF FAME

The Bryant athletic program has come a long way. What once was a few informal teams is now one of the most successful NCAA Division II programs in the East.

Much of the credit for that success belongs to the former athletes, coaches, and friends of the College.

To honor these former athletes, the Athletic Department has announced the creation of a Bryant Athletic Hall of Fame.

The Hall will be open to all former Bryant athletes, coaches, and individuals associated with the athletic program. Selection will be based upon athletic achievement while at Bryant; or by athletic, business, or public service achievements by former athletes after their graduation from the College or significant contributions to the world of athletics by a former Bryant student.

The first inductions will be held in February, 1987. But to make the Hall a success we need your help. Over the next few months, we will be gathering nominations for the Hall's first inductees. Make sure your class is represented. Send your nominations on this form.

STRATEGIC PLANNING II:

Focusing on Bryant's mission

By William T. O'Hara
President

The second exciting year of strategic planning is complete, and the Strategic Planning committee has released its report (this year entitled "Designs for Quality" to follow up on last year's "Catalyst for Quality") with a series of nine recommendations. Before I outline them for you, I want to tell you why we at Bryant feel it is so important to keep you informed about strategic planning.

Strategic planning is more than a behind-the-scenes administrative structure. It's more than a procedure for moving from one year to the next. Strategic planning reaches right down to the mission of the College and into the creative reservoirs of our faculty and staff. Tying together our strengths, our ideas, and our history, strategic planning is a dynamic process of guiding the course of the College.

It's important for you, as a constituent of Bryant College, to understand why we do what we do. Why we're building a new dormitory. Why we're building a Bryant Center. Why we're reaching into new geographic areas to bring the best and brightest students to our classrooms. We keep you updated on our progress in strategic planning because without your support, it wouldn't work. By understanding strategic planning, you understand the essence of Bryant College.

This year's recommendations come under three categories: the learning process, the learning environment, and institutional change.

Generation and implementation of innovative ideas. One of the most important qualities of strategic planning is a constant generation of new ideas. In the day-to-day responsibilities we all face, it is sometimes difficult to devote time to creative thinking.

Naturally, we cannot mandate creativity. But we can clear the way for good ideas to rise to the top of the strategic planning process. This plan will provide funds for the vice-presidents and academic chairpersons to build that process within their departments.

The Freshman Center. Too often colleges fail to think about implementing innovative programming for students until their junior or senior year. At Bryant we realize that this process must start from the moment a student arrives on campus. The Freshman Center is both physical and conceptual. Utilizing our freshman dormitories as a base, it will create developmental programs for freshmen including study skills, career development, health education, and social and cultural programming.

Learning for leadership program. Bryant's own motto, Education for Business Leadership, demonstrates the premium Bryant puts on the concept of leadership. This new program will examine the theoretical and applied, along with the historical and contemporary, concepts of leadership. The essence of the program will be to expose students to leaders in action, combined with class work, seminars, special projects, independent study, and research.

Competency-based learning. The most common criticism in contemporary reports on the status of higher education is that students are not proficient in the fundamental skills of reading, writing, and mathematics. An individual cannot function effectively in a career or in society without these skills. We propose to evaluate the skills of students as they enter Bryant, develop programs to improve these skills when needed, and then measure proficiency prior to graduation. The program will allow for remediation, reinforcement and enhancement of our undergraduate program where necessary.

Profiles in free enterprise program. This effort will expose Bryant students to the top business people in a wide range of areas. Our economic structure will be examined in terms of these executives' experiences and responsibilities.

Reaffirmation of internship and practicum program. Bryant's internship program is among the finest in the region. In its scope, flexibility, and effectiveness, it has few rivals and surpasses more publicly-known programs. Strategic planning in its second

E. Gardner Jacobs: Survived by a son, a daughter, and a College

By C. Ralph Adler

E. Gardner Jacobs called to chew me out. He had just received his new copy of the Bryant College catalog, which failed to mention that the College auditorium had recently been named after the family of a distinguished alumnus. He sought me out because as publications director, I was responsible for what he believed to be an inexcusable omission. Jacobs hadn't had daily contact with Bryant for a decade and a half (since he left the presidency and became chancellor), but it was still his college and he felt he needed to make this reprimand. I felt like the stray calf being called back in line by the head of the herd from a mile away.

For more than 60 years, Gardner Jacobs, who died on October 27 at the age of 84, projected this sense of benevolent authority. Until his death, Bryant was his "life's breath," in the words of a long-time colleague. His influence was so deep that one former officer of the College would not talk about his feelings for Jacobs. "The remembrances are so personal that I don't want them used in a public way," he said.

Gardner Jacobs was Bryant College's stepfather. Its real parent was Harry L. Jacobs, Gardner's father, who merged the Rhode Island Commercial School and the Bryant and Stratton School in 1916 to form Bryant College. Most accounts of those early days speak of austere, difficult times for the elder Jacobs who had to secure Bryant's future through the Depression and beyond. Harry Jacobs, by reputation, was a determined businessman who would use a steady, stern hand and a tight control over finances to insure the survival of Bryant.

As Harry Jacobs became older, son Gardner – who had at various times hit the road to recruit new students, coached the basketball team, taken inventory of College stock, and served as vice-president for development following his graduation from Bryant – gradually took control of the College during the 1950s.

Whether solely by his nature, or by astute realization of what Bryant's needs were, Gardner implemented a more humanistic, yet still rigidly controlled, atmosphere on campus. Lubov Titzmann, an employee at Bryant for 35 years, remembers that Jacobs would even bring his dog to work with him every day.

"He would never say no," said Helen Bochenek '34, who attributes all of her success today directly to Gardner Jacobs. An active student in college, Mrs. Bochenek remembers many times when a committee or organization would be stymied by a lack of funds, a problem that could always be solved by a quick visit to Jacob's office. When the Bochenek family could not afford to continue her education at Bryant, Jacobs – on his own initiative – contacted the young student and offered her a scholarship in exchange for helping around the campus after hours and on weekends. This faith proved contagious, as Mrs. Bochenek's parents recognized this personal gesture of confidence and generosity on the part of Jacobs and the College. Working with Bryant, they did all they could to make sure their daughter got her diploma. The Bochenek case is not an isolated one. "If it hadn't been for Gardner Jacobs, I couldn't have gone to Bryant College," is a common phrase heard from Bryant alumni who benefited from "unofficial" scholarships and loans.

"He was like our father," Mrs. Bochenek recalls, with all of the love, fear, and respect that goes with the title. When Bryant faced a serious challenge in its accreditation drive in the 1960s, Mrs. Bochenek and other Bryant alumni answered the call for help. The library needed more books to meet the standards of accreditation. "We hauled in books of all sorts," she recalls, from home libraries and dusty cellars. Even in later years, Gardner Jacobs would routinely dispense his advice when alumni asked for it. "He was the most wonderful friend I ever could have in this world. He was an angelic man," Mrs. Bochenek said. "He helped me see the world from a business way. I miss him very much, but I know that God must have needed him to build some school or college somewhere."

Though Jacobs needed to leave an impression on his world, he was not the most likely individual to build a college. He has been described as intelligent, but not an intellect; as an educator, but not a teacher. In his view, education was not an end. "The ultimate goal of education for free men in a free society is wisdom," he once said. "It is the ability to make wise, independent decisions based upon accurate facts, clear reasoning, and understanding."

Those words – delivered in a commencement speech but undoubtedly fine-tuned by professional writers (Jacobs's way with words was more direct) – could just as easily apply to successful business as successful living. He conducted his life as he taught people to conduct a business, with an enlightened view of how "profit" could be defined in different terms.

Described by Gertrude Hochberg, retired vice-president for public affairs, as "a man without pretense," he strongly objected to being called the boss though he clearly understood which individuals were "the bosses" in academia, business, and government. He intuitively knew which buttons to push to constantly move Bryant College into a more respected position (and he was as likely to do it by playing a friendly game of cards every week as by meeting in a corporate boardroom.) Living in the shadow of Brown University on the East Side of Providence, Bryant had an even greater task in turning attention to its growth. Though Bryant's reputation was strong with the companies who hired its graduates, it had things to prove to its sister institutions. And without its accreditation by the New England Association of Schools and Colleges, Bryant could only expect its alumni to move so far up the management ladder. Even government frowned on professional education. Bryant found that its fundamental philosophy – education in the practical matters of business – could also be its greatest burden.

Gardner Jacobs understood that Bryant's only hope for continued growth (even though he didn't want to get "too big," he would say) was to pursue accreditation. The Jacobs family would have to give up its proprietary ownership, the College would have to be incorporated as non-profit operated under a board of trustees, and its curriculum would need to add liberal arts courses to provide for a more rounded education for its students.

This could not have been a painless decision. Such a move would diminish the influence of the Jacobs name, and invite a whole set of variables such as new administrators and new ideas. It would be giving up the child to a new set of parents.

But Gardner Jacobs plunged into the process with an energy that bordered on obsession. He began his own program of public relations that spread the word about Bryant while he made the contacts with CEOs, senators, governors, and college and university presidents which would bring Bryant into the fraternity of respected institutions.

Much of what happened was "like a fairy tale," Jacobs said in an interview recorded last summer as part of an oral history project for the College. One of the best "happily ever afters" for Jacobs came on the day he met Earl Tupper for the first time. The two men met at the Biltmore Hotel in Providence after being introduced by mutual acquaintances. And after several hours, Jacobs walked out into the streets of Providence with the promise of a gift – over 200 acres of prime Smithfield property which had been coveted by a number of organizations, including the Boy Scouts and the YMCA. Jacobs had gone with the intention of making a deal with Tupper. He ended up so impressing Tupper that he got the land for nothing.

"What the hell did you do, hypnotize the guy?" was the reaction from Bryant's lawyer when Jacobs returned to the campus with the good news. But elation was mixed with tension over the ensuing days as the deal came close to finalization. When Tupper flew from the Bahamas to Providence to sign on the dotted line, "we prayed the plane would stay up" over the ocean, Jacobs recalled.

If the deal with Tupper came about with the help of fate, many of Jacobs's successes resulted from years of cultivating the right people. When Bryant desperately needed a dormitory, he flew to Washington to seek some federal housing money which, he had been told, was already expended on other projects. "God was with me," he said, as he walked into the office to find that the individual in charge of dispersing the funds had ties to Bryant. He got a pledge for $180,000 – if he could get trustee approval in 24 hours. Jacobs spent the next day making phone calls and flying between Providence, Washington, and New York to make sure Bryant got that money.

But Jacobs considered accreditation to be his crowning achievement. It did not come easily. After making the commitment to accreditation, Jacobs and his staff conferred with the presidents of many colleges and universities to determine exactly what had to be done. There were two main goals: increase the quality of the faculty, and build up what had been a very lean library. After working to achieve every letter of the qualifications of accreditation, Jacobs invited the accreditation committee to review the improvements at Bryant. Somewhat bitterly, Jacobs recalled last summer that the accreditation was denied at that point, for what he felt were personal, and not professional, reasons. But Jacobs rallied to come back from this setback, and on its second try, Bryant won its accreditation.

Gertrude Hochberg remembers the day when the staff lingered around the phones waiting for a call from Boston, where Jacobs was waiting to learn of the committee's decision. "We were on pins and needles," she recalls. She remembers the thrill in Jacob's voice when he called, and that thrill hardly ever faded as Jacobs would walk by the framed letter of accreditation on his wall and salute it nearly every day.

Building the new campus was also a source of pride for Gardner Jacobs, and in this project he used his common sense and instincts as strongly as he had in the past. When architect Robert Hillier approached Bryant to make a proposal for designing the new campus, he was the only one who brought a campus model with him, a fact which impressed Jacobs. "I liked the little guy," Jacobs said of Hillier in his characteristically direct way, "although I wouldn't trust his partner with my cat." He asked Hillier to come back without the partner and a deal was struck, but not before Jacobs sent a delegation to Rutgers in New Jersey, where Hillier had designed a similar unistructure. The delegation was instructed to speak with faculty, students, and maintenance people to cover every aspect of the building's strengths and weaknesses.

Just as the new campus was about to open, Jacobs made a difficult decision: to step down as president. When asked why during his interview last summer, Jacobs paused and then answered modestly: "I thought Bryant should have a president with a different name." He sounded again like a father making a decision that hurts personally, but helps the offspring.

Amid these many triumphs, there were few days of sadness during Gardner Jacobs's time at Bryant College. There were inevitable conflicts between Gardner and his father, which must be expected in any institution where the administrative structure has some semblance to a dynasty. The younger Jacobs had a solid reputation for being fair to his employees, so he was saddened when the faculty elected to institute a union. "I don't believe in unions," Jacobs said. "If you treat them (the faculty) properly and have fair pay, I don't think you need a union." Jacobs also faced fewer challenges than other college presidents when it came to student unrest in the sixties. Most of Bryant's protests came in the early seventies when Dr. Nelson Gulski served as acting president.

Though many of his attitudes had their roots in tradition, Jacobs was an early defender of civil rights and the recognition of the equality of women. He assisted in the efforts of the United Negro College Fund, and sponsored a major conference on the status of women.

Though he was progressive in his thinking on the issues of human rights facing the United States in the sixties, Gardner Jacobs was fiercely patriotic and had no patience for the majority of student protesters across the country. In an address at commencement in 1967, Jacobs said, "...this whole question of opposition or revolt among the young people of today to anything old, or stereotyped or staid or old fashioned, is vastly overplayed. At every level of society, one can always find a few far-out thinkers... who, through shrill, hysterical opposition to anything with which they do not agree, get space on the front pages of newspapers. Others, including this graduating class at Bryant, go about their way rationalizing issues in non-violent fashion, keeping their feet on the ground... in the broader social questions."

In this sense, Jacobs firmly backed up his belief in working within the rules of society with hard work in the community. "The educated individual makes his education matter by attempting to make a somewhat better world than the one he inherited," he once said, and he proved it: by working with the Providence Rotary Club, the Boys' Club, Butler and Roger Williams Hospitals, Citizens Savings Bank, Blue Cross of Rhode Island, the Sophia Little Home of Providence, the Rhode Island Historical Society, and the Rhode Island Council for Equal Employment Opportunity.

His patriotic fervor was demonstrated in his work for military and civic groups, as director of the Division of Public Relations for the Rhode Island Council of Defense, director and co-founder of the Rhode Island Council of War Agencies, and president of the Rhode Island Film Council.

Jacobs was no stranger to awards. Bryant College, Rhode Island College, Portia Law School, and Calvin Coolidge College all awarded him honorary degrees. One of Rhode Island's highest honors – membership in the Rhode Island Heritage Hall of Fame – was granted to him in 1973. One of the College's first major dormitories was named after him, as was the driveway onto Bryant's current campus.

While these awards speak of the pride Rhode Island and Bryant had in Gardner Jacobs, they don't reflect the warmth of the personal remembrances spoken by some of his colleagues and friends at a memorial service on the College campus shortly after his death. Those in attendance included his daughter, Dr. Frances H. Jacobs, and son, Dr. E. Gardner Jacobs, Jr. The audience reflected the kind of mix that makes up Bryant today – the older faces representing the College from its beginnings, and the newer faces – some who had never seen Gardner Jacobs – representing today's ideas and energies which combine with the old to give Bryant its contemporary character.

Dr. Gulski, who knew Gardner Jacobs for 60 years, had many praises for Jacobs, not the least of which was that "he threw a mean curve" in his bowling league. "He was not a silver tongued orator, he was not an academician – he never taught a class," Gulski said. "But he cared and he did something about it. This was the mark of the man. He cared. His love of his fellow man is what we should strive to emulate."

"I will remember him for his generosity," said President William T. O'Hara. "I came to bis college. Never once did he dictate to me or second guess a decision. He would suggest or urge, but he always said you are the president."

Other people paying tribute to Gardner Jacobs were Jeff Barovich, president of the Student Senate, professor Henry Foley, and professor Robert Birn – the faculty member with the longest tenure at Bryant – who called Jacobs "a true friend in every sense."

Unquestionably, Gardner Jacobs would not approve of the high praise. Achievement and progress were, to him, merely an obligation, nothing out of the ordinary. If he had to be honored, he undoubtedly would have preferred the way Gertrude Hochberg said it:

"He was a regular guy."

Roundtable luncheon describes "ultimate" job search

Mark Campbell, a professional seminar leader, was the featured speaker at the November roundtable sponsored by the Graduate School Alumni Steering Committee. Campbell, who is the manager of human resources, planning and development at the Northrop Corporation, spoke about the qualities that make up a true "professional."

In December, Ted Lecas, owner and president of Romac and Associates, a personal consulting firm in Providence, shared his expertise on how to conduct the "ultimate" job search.

Graduate Alumni Brunch set for February 8

Personal financial planning will be the topic of conversation at a brunch to be held on February 8 at Bryant College.

Charles Calverley, Jr. '57 MBA '85, senior vice-president and trust officer at Pawtucket Institute for Savings and Trust, and Larry Kortick '83 MST, CPA and partner at Priest, Kortick and Jesmondi Limited will be the guest panelists.

The brunch, which is sponsored by the Graduate School Alumni Steering Committee, is open to all alumni and will begin at 11 a.m. in the Nelson Gulski Dining Room.

For more information and reservations, please contact the Alumni Office at 232-6040.

Arlene Violet to speak at SNEAC Luncheon

Attorney General Arlene Violet will be the guest speaker at a luncheon sponsored by the Southeastern New England Alumni Chapter.

The luncheon will be held on Wednesday, February 5 at noon at the Turks Head Club in Providence. Reservations are $10 per person and may be made by contacting the Alumni Office at 232-6040. All guests and friends of alumni are welcome.

SNEAC news

A discussion of President Reagan's tax proposals drew 40 alumni to a luncheon at the Turks Head Club in October. Kevin Currier '84 MST, a tax manager for the Providence Office of Arthur Young & Company, was the guest speaker.

In December, the Southeastern New England Alumni Chapter sponsored an evening at Trinity Square Repertory Theatre in Providence. Alumni and friends attended the theater's annual performance of "A Christmas Carol" followed by a reception at the Player's Corner Pub.

Are you on the SNEAC mailing list? If you live in Rhode Island or Southeastern Massachusetts or within driving distance to Rhode Island and would like to be placed on the SNEAC mailing list, please notify the Alumni Office. Being placed on this list entitles you to receive notice of every event planned by SNEAC.

Awards dinner dance April 5

Recognition of the 1986 businessperson of the year will highlight the second annual Graduate School Alumni Association Awards Dinner Dance to be held on April 5 at the Coachmen Restaurant in Tiverton.

Also receiving awards will be members of the 1986 MBA class who have been admitted to the Delta Mu Delta honor society and graduate faculty who have taught at Bryant for 5 or 10 years.

The dinner dance is open to all alumni, faculty, staff, and students. Tickets are $22.50 per person and reservations may be made by contacting the Alumni Office at 232-6040.

Student Alumni Association

Students are amazed that the fall semester has ended and another is fast approaching. The SAA's fall finale was celebrated by over 30 members at the annual holiday banquet held on December 5 at the King's Inn, Lincoln. Kelly Parkins, president, expressed her appreciation to the members for all their hard work and dedication displayed throughout the semester.

Among activities that lie ahead for the spring semester are: (in February) a Senior Survival Program in which alumni return to speak on various topics related to life after Bryant; (in March) an Easter Basket solicitation of faculty, staff, and alumni for food which is distributed to the needy; a spring break trip to Cancun, Mexico, and a Bryant Fund phonathon challenge; (in April) a survey of the senior class to determine what they know about existing alumni programs and to find out what programs they would like to see implemented, the election of executive officers; (in May) OOOZEBALL, or volleyball in the mud where you can join the Alumni Association members or form your own team and challenge the SAA to a game; and final exam kits and fruit baskets; and (in June) Alumni Weekend.

Alumni players to meet Bryant on the court

The fourth annual alumni men's basketball game will be held on Saturday, February 1 on the Bryant campus.

The alumni game will be the first of three games to be played that day. The second game will see the women's varsity team playing American International in a Northeast-8 conference game at 5:30 p.m., followed by the men's varsity contest with American International at 7:30 p.m.

Any former player who would like to play in the game should call the Athletic Department at (401) 232-6070. And for anyone who wants to see if youth can defeat experience, the alumni game goes on at 2 p.m.

Wanted: lost alumni

As Alumni Weekend draws near, the office of Alumni Relations is attempting to contact everyone who is celebrating a class reunion. Over the years the office has lost track of the following people. If you know the whereabouts of a classmate listed below, please let them know we are looking for them. What's in it for you? A fun and enjoyable weekend with your entire class!
