A HISTORY OF A NOVEL IDEA

Kapala Press 2015 Ellensburg

PREFACE by Bouvard Pécuchet

Shaggy curves in a fuzzy country. In turn, a state with roads that aren't on any map.

This story combines mystery, adventure, and inquiry. It's the story of an idea. It is also the inner, outer, and secret autobiography of a man. The measure is time. The place is the mind.

This painting is art brut. The colors are fauve. The forms verge on the surreal. There is a mustache on the Mona Lisa. And then, it is erased.

This music is punk capriccio. You can hear a requiem contrapuntal to a marching band. Night in Tunisia beat out on the lid of a garbage can. John Cage playing an electrified cactus with a feather.

The imaginary prisons of Piranesi. The continuous conundrums of Escher.

Hard whites, infernal yellows, sulfur and yellowgreen. It starts with a smudge of paint and becomes a painting. It starts with silence and becomes the sound of one hand clapping. It is seriously silly. Weep anew!

A rose is a rose is a rose. – Gertrude Stein

A ~~rose~~ is a ~~rose~~ is a ~~rose~~. – Martin Heidegger

~~A rose is a rose is a rose.~~ – Longchen Rabjam

Whence came this idea, from what source, origin, or cause? A full, scientific description of the process an idea undergoes in its formation is not yet possible, but, given the limitations of my memory and my ability to reflect, I can trace the tendrils of the idea I have in mind back to my first readings of Nietzsche, after I had flunked out of Cal Berkeley, in 1960.

The volume I was reading in the area designated for lunch breaks at the State Farm Insurance Company, where I was employed as a bindery clerk in the Administrative Services Department, was the Doubleday Anchor edition of Francis Golffing's translations of The Birth of Tragedy and The Genealogy of Morals by Friedrich Nietzsche. Both books deal with the dissonance between the moral and aesthetic approaches to life.

Aesthetics and morals. Another tendril takes me to a question I asked Allen Ginsberg at the Berkeley Poetry Conference, in 1965. I had ventured north from California State Polytechnic College, in San Luis Obispo, where I had been studying English and Philosophy, to rub shoulders with poets from the Beat Generation, the Black Mountain School, and the San Francisco Renaissance. Having discussed with Gary Snyder my plan to go to Alaska and earn money to start a bookstore in Berkeley and receiving the advice not to start a bookstore in Berkeley but to go to the hinterlands and find a place that needed a Berkeley-style bookstore, I asked Allen Ginsberg whether it was better to be a good business man and a bad poet or a good poet and a bad business man. (Yes, young men ask these kinds of questions.) Allen said, "Just be good!"

And another tendril reaches into a poem I wrote at Lu Garcia's house soon after the conclusion of the Berkeley Poetry Conference:

The tap root of the idea I have in mind is to be found in Plato. There the transcendentals (the True, the Good, and the Beautiful) are ontological properties of Being. Truth can be verified by reason, the Good by action, and the Beautiful by experience of proportional harmony. In the Symposium (Cooper, John, ed. 1997. Plato: Complete Works, Indianapolis: Hackett, p. 211), Plato says, "The true order of going is to use the beauties of the earth as steps along which to mount upwards for the sake of that other beauty: from fair forms to fair practices, and from fair practices to fair notions until he arrives at the idea of absolute beauty." Perusing the Wikipedia article on the transcendentals, I see that France Diderot compared the True, the Good, and the Beautiful to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and the German J. G. Sulzer, in a supplement to Diderot's Encyclopaedie in 1776, translated the ideas in terms of the aesthetic, the moral, and the intellectual. (Crocker L. G., Two Diderot Studies (Johns Hopkins University Press, 1952, pp. 99-101.) Truth-Goodness-Beauty become linked and convergent, almost like atoms of thought. You cannot have one without the other.

But what is the idea that has come to obsess me? Dear reader, please indulge me a little longer. I am warming to my subject, but I wish to proceed cautiously, introducing important characters and events as ballast to my intellectual endeavor. Ideas can remain dormant for long intervals. Like with a plant, the right conditions may not be present to enable the seed to sprout. The earth may be fertile; the air may be moist; but the temperature and light might be inadequate for germination. I feel my idea needed time not only to germinate but to grow. What other factors were involved in this idea? Who else had a hand in its development?

The idea appeared in my consciousness just after the completion of a traditional Tibetan Buddhist three-year retreat where I was ensconced in the cabin, known as Luminous Peak, at Tara Mandala Retreat Center in the San Juan Mountains, near Pagosa Springs, Colorado. I had completed a cycle of practices known as Dzinpa Rangdröl (Self-liberation of Clinging), a mind terma (treasure) revealed by Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje (1800-1866).

Ideas are funny things. I use the term "funny" both in the sense of amusing or comical and as curious or strange. Having completed my long retreat, I am amused (or, perhaps, the more accurate term would be to say that it is ironic) that, after all these years of rigorous mental training which were designed to enable me to rest in the nature of mind and stabilize the practice of non-thought, I would be having philosophical thoughts at all. Well, lo and behold, as all Dzog Chen meditators know, even if you have the ability to contemplate emptiness and rest in rigpa (ordinary mind), thoughts still arise. Whether you attach and cling to them or not is what is important. One discovers that when thoughts arise, they self-liberate all by themselves. No effort is required. But if a thought arises and the meditator becomes distracted (either caused by an idea from within or an event from without) and investigates the distraction, say traces it to a point in the past or projects it into the future, then the mind of the meditator leaves the state of calm abiding, moves away from the mindful-awareness meditation, and becomes engaged in a process of ratiocination.

As I said, I had completed my traditional three-year retreat. This was in the fall of 2012. There was a facet of the Dzog Chen training still to be transmitted by Tulku Sang ngag, our vajra master, but that would transpire at the lama's pleasure. My friend, Beth Lee-Herbert, who had completed her retreat in Karuna, a cabin about a mile from Luminous Peak, and I were now trying to re-enter the everyday world. We were having a rough go of it. As might be expected, it was not easy to leave our snug nests after three years (in our case, four) in isolation. True, we had gone from our cabins to the temple for brief periods to receive transmissions and explanations of the yogic practices we were to practice and accomplish, but for long stretches of time (six to eight months during the inclement months and, at other times, periods of one hundred days) we had only the wild folk as our companions.

Life in the world and life in the sangha (the fellowship of practitioners that had supported us) had continued unabated while Beth and I were in retreat. During the time frame of our retreat, a three-storied temple had been erected at Tara Mandala. Lama Tsultrim's vision, which she had while in retreat during the 1970's, had now evolved and manifested as a world-renowned retreat center in a dramatic physical setting. But for the first two yogis to complete the long retreat at Tara Mandala, it was bumpy re-entering samsara. Even a pure land with retreat center is a mini-samsara. And there was Facebook and smart phones to contend with, and the economy was coming out of a huge recession, and there were new rules to be followed on the land, and then, a large statue of Machig Lapdrön (a 12th century Tibetan saint) went missing.

The county sheriff's department investigated and determined, based on the evidence—an empty wine bottle left on the altar, an empty bag that had contained beef jerkey, and deep footprints that led into the sagebrush—that the crime was vandalism. Perhaps, someone dared someone else to sneak into the temple and abscond with a statue. Once the police had left the scene, an internal investigation led to a different conclusion. A particular nun was found to be responsible because she had neglected to perform a required protectors practice. However, this particular nun had been invited to attend a yoga workshop and another nun had done the practice. The other nun was deemed an improper substitute because she was from a different lineage, regardless of her having been practicing with us for over a year. Therefore, it was determined that a karmic break in the protectors' practice had occurred, and demons had found a way to violate the temple. I was fully aware that Tibetans take their demonology very seriously and that the protectors practices are important in and around a temple to prevent harmful influences and obstacles, but I did not expect westerners with a high degree of empirical knowledge to be this superstitious and fall prey to Buddhist fundamentalism. I was shocked by this outcome.

My formal three-year retreat was completed, but I put myself back into retreat to reflect on new developments in my understanding of the nature of reality. Karma had now become a concept that bore some consideration. I sat down and read Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace in the Anthony Briggs English translation (Penguin Classics). After years of immersing myself in Eastern mysticism, I needed to balance my mind with something from the West. War and Peace had the weight needed. Not only is it a great read, but it's also an extended meditation on causality. Tolstoy reveals that there is but a mere coincidence between the attempts of his characters to shape history to their own desires and what is actually happening independent of their actions.

Karma can be described as both the activity and the result. Approaches to karma according to Trinley Norbu (White Sail, Shambhala, 1992): (1) karma originates in subjective consciousness (Vaisesika); (2) karma originates in ordinary conscious mind (Sutranta); (3) karma originates in the basis of all phenomena (Yogacara); (4) karma originates in interdependent circumstances (Madhyamika).

There is a basis for enlightenment in all these points of view, even though in the enlightenment stage of realization the effect of karma is transcended. From the practice of Vajrayana one discovers that is unnecessary to divide cause from result, and one thereby recognizes all activity is the spontaneous display of the emptiness of all phenomena and self. One realizes that there is no possessor of phenomena, so therefore all phenomena become illusory with the freedom of non-attachment. From the Dzog Chen (Great Perfection) perspective, there is no karma: if phenomena are unborn, there is nothing effected; therefore, there can be no results. Still, karma is taught. Patrul Rinpoche, in The Words of My Perfect Teacher (Shambhala 1994), writes:

*You know the relative to be a lie, yet still you practice the two accumulations.
You realize that in the absolute there is nothing to be meditated on, yet still you practice meditation.
You see relative and absolute as one, yet still you diligently practice.
Peerless Teacher, at your feet I bow.*

I knew an idea was beginning to percolate. Bubbles were beginning to appear on the surface of my mind. I had been nearly four years in a cauldron under intense pressure. I read; I reflected; I meditated; and, then I went AWOL.

My gate keeper, Ani Kunsang, gave me a ride to town. I went to my storage locker, started my truck, and drove to Santa Fe. I contacted Lama Gyurme, whom I had assisted in the painting of lintels for the Tara Temple before going into retreat. It was Lama Gyurme who had sealed me into retreat, and I had promised him I would be his assistant upon completion of my retreat, and I wanted to talk with him and make plans for the next stage of my transition back into the everyday world. I stayed with Lama Gyurme and his family in their apartment at Project Tibet on Canyon Road where I contracted a stomach virus, and a flow of vomit and shit projected from my orifices until I was exhausted. Then, I slept for two days and nights, occasionally receiving sips of chicken soup. When I could move around again, I headed back to Tara Mandala, knowing I should be present for a Solstice Ceremony to be held in the temple.

On my way along Hwy 84, just before I reached Abiquiu, I passed an inn with a gift shop, and I decided to turn around and go back in order to buy a present for Lama Tsultrim. Not a smart move. I picked the worst spot along the road between Santa Fe and Pagosa Springs to make this maneuver, and I was hit broadside by a car containing two women with their babies strapped in car seats. The place I had decided to make my U turn was between two curves, so I was not hit by a car traveling at high speed, but the impact was still severe.

The seat belt tightly gripped me. The air bag punched me. The impact sent my vehicle into a spin. I felt as though I was writhing in centrifugal force. My left eye saw dark and my right eye saw light. I looked up and saw the flat top of Pedernal Mountain, a mountain I knew from the paintings of Georgia O'Keefe and is a physical and spiritual sentinel, central in the belief systems of the Apache, the Tewa, and the Navajo. A protector if there ever was one.

After the police arrived and it was determined that no one was injured, only shaken up, the vehicles were removed from the scene, the broken glass swept up, and I found myself standing by the side of the road with a satchel of clothes in one hand and a pair of snow boots in the other. A highway patrol man in a cruiser asked me if he could drop me off anywhere. I told him that I wanted to go to the Abiquiu Inn, which was just around the bend. He drove me there. I got out of the cruiser. The wind was blowing. A tumble weed rolled by. I was wearing my robes, and they fluttered. The cruiser pulled away, and I entered the inn. There was a large photograph of Georgia O'Keefe above the counter. She was seated on the back of a motorcycle behind a man and turned towards the photographer with her hand raised in farewell. There was ethereal parlor music playing on the speaker system. Beneath the photo was a gray-haired lady that looked very much like the famous painter. She smiled and said, "Interesting escort you had." I thought, "Shit, I must be dead." If this were so, it would be ontologically inconvenient for me to return to Tara Mandala for the Solstice ceremony.

"I had an accident on the road," I said. "I gathered as much from the how the traffic slowed down," she said. "Would you like a cup of tea?"

I drank a cup of tea and booked myself into a room. I lay on the bed and stared at the ceiling. There was a stain where water had seeped through the plaster. I concluded from my feelings that I was out of my body and having a transpersonal experience on a subtle level arising from poor judgment on the causal level. I was experiencing confusion, and I attempted to organize my thoughts along the lines of Ken Wilber's 4 quadrants: the subjective, personal experience in the upper left-hand quadrant; the objective, measurable experience in the upper right-hand quadrant; the subjective, shared experience in the lower left-hand quadrant; and the measurable, institutional experience in the lower right-hand quadrant.

The subjective-"I" experience consisting of my eruption from retreat, my broken samaya with my lama, a possible awakening or heightening of consciousness through the recent near death event in the world space. The measurable events involved the various forces (horizontal and centrifugal) of two cars colliding (skid marks, speed) and any wounds or bruises, aches and pains on my body. The subject, shared dimension consisted of myths of descent and dismemberment (Iannah, Dionysus, and the accident happening at the base of Pedernal could easily be a magic-myth archetype image related to Tröma the wrathful tutelary deity of my recent meditations, the wrathful, devouring mother of primordial, transpersonal experience/trauma. And the measurable side involving institutional personae consisted of the County Sheriff Department, the medics, and State Farm Insurance Company, as well as the Albiqui Inn where I was presently residing. At any rate, it was bad spot on the highway to make a U-turn.

The saga continued. I phoned Lama Tsultrim and told her what had happened, and she sent Beth to get me and bring me to the land. After a bath in Epson salts and many consoling words, I returned to Luminous Peak to reflect and heal. There, I re-read Nietzsche's Birth of Tragedy, looking for the exact moment this saga began. Here are two quotes that I copied into my notebook from Part V:

But to the extent that the subject is an artist he is already delivered from individual will and has become a medium through which the True Subject celebrates His redemption in illusion.

Only as an esthetic product can the world be justified to all eternity—although our consciousness of our own significance does scarcely exceed the consciousness a painted soldier might have of the battle in which he takes part.

I left retreat with Lama Tsultrim's Blessing, in February of 2013, and returned to Santa Fe. I moved into a room in a large adobe-style house that belonged to Lama Gyurme, his wife, Yudron, and his young son, Trinley. I received the Togal stage of retreat teachings in the Dzog Chen practices at Tulku Sang ngag's retreat center near Glorieta, which he calls "The Seat of Longchenpa." I continued to practice Dzog Chen, assist Lama Gyurme when needed, and work on my autobiography, Jampa's Worldly Dharmas, a trilogy running to nearly a thousand pages, written in the third person by my persona, Bouvard Pécuchet.

One morning, while having tea at The Teahouse on Canyon Road, I looked up and saw that a young woman across from me was reading Nietzsche's Beyond Good and Evil. It is not unusual for the students who attend St. John's College to read original texts. It is the required curriculum at this school. I asked the woman how she fared in her endeavor. She smiled and replied that she was enjoying the book. We got to talking, and we soon knew we were becoming friends. I even so far as to loan her a copy of a no-longer needed draft of the first volume of my trilogy. She told me she was soon to teach a class on art at the University of Nevada in Las Vegas and would reach me by email. I received the following:

Dear Jampa,

I have been meaning to write you all week to tell you how much I enjoyed our conversation at the Tea House a week and a half ago, the one that began with Nietzsche and moved on to many other things. I have to tell you it came as a particular gift insofar as I had been for the hour or two previous despairing over the dim intelligence of our world, having been subjected just before you arrived to an hour of the most banal conversation imaginable by three very loud women at another table. To encounter someone as well read and thoughtful and insightful as you felt at that moment a minor miracle.

Also, I am really enjoying your book! I must admit that after I left the Tea House, some hesitation set in, and I wondered if I should have agreed to take it. It is something I usually avoid doing, since I am an exceptionally critical reader and find myself hating most of what I read, particularly if it comes from someone who hasn't been dead for many years. To read something bad from a person I like is deeply unpleasant experience. But not only do I not hate your book, I am thoroughly enjoying it! This may come as no surprise to you, but as we were strangers, I couldn't have known. It has a wonderful liveliness; it's funny and odd and insightful, and the poetry tucked within it is quite lovely.

I am also struck by several curious parallels with myself and my life, which is perhaps not surprising in light of our conversation. I read the "Boats" chapter today - Moby Dick is a very important book for me, and your writing reminded me of a little photo book project that I assembled but never got printed up. Have you read much Conrad? I've been enchanted with his sea novels lately (especially Nostromo [not purely a sea novel, but a brilliant novel that involves the sea] and Lord Jim), largely for reasons you point to in Melville. Also, I am writing a novel about a cattle baron ("Animals"), and have written a great deal about art ("Art").

I will save more extensive commentary until I have finished, but in the meantime please know that I am enjoying it.

I'm writing from a hotel room in Las Vegas, Nevada. I'm here to teach a couple of four-week classes to art students at UNLV; I was nervous to come, for various reasons, but the first week went fine and at the moment I am happy for the quiet and the isolation. I deeply dislike Las Vegas, but there is a special kind of peace to a cheap hotel room - I am, in many ways, a monastic at heart - and the writing has been going well. As I said, I am writing a novel about a cattle baron in western South Dakota around the turn of the last century, and about his granddaughter, who is half Lakota. It was largely for this book that I was reading Nietzsche, because it is also a book about the story of western philosophy, and about American history. It's a book about a lot of things. It is my second novel. I should be working on getting the first one published but I am dragging my feet, so it languishes.

Most of my published writing has been art criticism. I lived in LA for fifteen years before moving back to Santa Fe (my hometown) last summer, and I wrote for the LA Times and various magazines - that is why I'm here in Las Vegas. But I've had a kind of crisis of faith with all that and I don't really know where it's going anymore. I'm supposed to be working on a book about art, specifically the concept of value in art - that is what my classes are based on. But every time I sit down to try to do it, I spin out very quickly into despair - from why does art matter? to why does anything matter? It's been a problem. I have always wished I could be a scholar of some obscure and narrow field - but it was not meant to be: everything spins out to the existential. It's maddening.

Well, I hope you don't mind a long-ish note. Thank you again for your book. I've been noting, in pencil, typos here and there, as you suggested - though very few. Best of luck in your continued reading/revision/reflection with the other two.

Best, Holly

dear holly,

thank you for your note, it touched me, meaning that i felt a sympathetic soul responding to my work, and it touched on some important philosophical, maybe spiritual, issues i too have been struggling with

yes, our lives do seem to have points of contact, like you writing about south dakota, because just before i went into retreat, i was at the pine ridge reservation, in my robes, dancing with the lakota under the arbor, while my son completed his sundance for that year and one of my daughters is working on her dissertation to complete a doctorate in art history at the university of washington, her thesis on the italian art movement of arte povera, and she will soon travel to milan to interview germano celant, the organizer of that art movement and now artistic director of the prada foundation, believe me, she has similar concerns, and she is a "scholar of some obscure and narrow field" as you put it and she too has existential angst, yes, it is maddening, but she presses on with her work

i suppose i have a slight advantage in this angst business being a buddhist, since we don't get upset that there is no conceptual "meaning to things" and we just relax into the "emptiness" rather than freaking out, and i can do art for the sake of art, selfish of me to be sure, and my writing i do for the "invisible circle" and for "the process" rather than for any material reason, lucky me as for meaning, well, guess what? right now, i'm trying to figure out a new system of ethics based on aesthetics, something stimulated by the quote from c.s. lewis, "beauty will save the world...but what kind of beauty?" hmmm, maybe you have an idea

you see, we are in a dark void without beauty, and it's no wonder we fall into despair and wonder about the meaning of life, and it doesn't help being told we think too much, since it is really the case that no one seems to be thinking at all, so there's a lot of work to do to change the moral landscape rather than just leaving things in the messy mess they are at present, and a good place to begin is to "worship at the font of beauty" as pound put it, since so few do

oh, well, how i do go on, an email is no place for this, and i hope we can talk later, when you return in the meantime, keep the faith and teach well

your friend, Jampa

"Beauty will save the world...but what kind of beauty?" Reflecting on Lewis's question brought me to a line in my poem "Patterns":

there is beauty in the moral order and I asked, "Is there morality in the aesthetic order?"

I proceed, as is the wont of the present generation, to surf the net, and I encountered a philosopher, unknown to me, by the name of Slavoj Žižek. I like the guy. He's on you tube. You can watch him fidget. He wipes his nose with one hand and pinches himself (perhaps, to be sure he exists) with another. He sweats. He complicates things. He turns out to be a superstar on the philosophical circuit, and in one of his online lectures, Slavoj Žižek (1949-), a Slovenian Marxist introduces me to work of Fredrich Wilhem Joseph Schelling (1775-1854), a German Idealist considered to be the Father of the Romantic Movement.

I looked for a copy of Žižek's The Invisible Remainder: On Schelling and Related Matters at the Meem Library on the St. John's campus, but it was not in the catalog. Schelling was there, and I found his Philosophical Investigations into the Essence of Human Thinking, or I thought I had, but, later, at the betterday coffeehouse, upon looking at the book I had checked out, I found that it was Schelling's Treatise on the Essence of Human Freedom by Martin Heidegger, translated by Joan Stambaugh. "Oh well," I thought, "secondary material is frowned on at St. John's...Heidegger(!?)...might be alright (...even if he was a Nazi?...yes)..." And so, I began in a reasonable manner to deconstruct my sense of Philosophical Thought...in a reasonable manner, mind you...to be open to new themes and new meems to generate God knows what.

The use of "God" here may seem odd for a Buddhist, but I thank God for all His blessings and for the many, many instructive lessons that I have received. I am grateful for this life, even if, as St.

Augustine put it, we are born amid piss and shit. Jampa was born with a silver spoon in my mouth, the better to feed off the offal.

How do I reconcile my Judeo-Christian faith with that of Buddhism? To me it is easier to be a Buddhist and a Christian than it is to be a Christian and a Buddhist. The First Commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," is not a problem for a Buddhist, as we do not believe in a creator god. Gautama and other buddhas are men and women who are given respect because they have attained the state of enlightenment, the true understanding of the nature of mind, comprised of luminous cognitive emptiness. And I do not presume to equate EMPTINESS with God, even if the mirror-like wisdom inherent in the natural state of mind (emptiness/well-being) allows us to create the concept of God in our own image.

Buddha-mind is said to be, by those who have attained this realization, to be beyond description, but the path to enlightenment can be communicated. The Buddhist approach to the meaning of Life is understood within a psychological context, and the metaphysical approach of Christians, with the emphasis on proving God's existence independent of humans, is abandoned. The ontological solution is: nothing really exists in and of itself. Even Heidegger's inquiry into "Being" can be considered an etymological tempest in a teapot.

However, Heidegger might not agree, or maybe he would, resting where he rests. But I digress.

Morality in the Aesthetic Order. Could be a title, I thought.

Is it possible to have knowledge of what is right and wrong? What foundation for morality is there beyond the Good. How separate the Good from the True from the Beautiful and expect right action?

Freedom, according to Heidegger, determines true Being and transcends all human being. Man is grounded in Freedom, but as Heidegger points out: "The God in becoming emerges in his becoming to something which has become and is the one who he is in this becoming as it. The inner-divine becoming is originally the self-seeing of the God himself in his ground so that this look remains in the ground. Just as when one person looks at the other in distant correspondence and, looking into him, longing becomes clearer in the self-seeing of the God in his ground, but that means precisely all the more aroused and craving. The ground thus wants to be more and more ground, and at the same time it can only will this by willing what is clear and thus striving against itself as what is dark." (Schelling's Treatise on the Essence of Human Freedom, Martin Heidegger, translated by Joan Stambaugh, Ohio University Press, Athens, 1985, p. 136.)

Nietzsche also propounds this idea Beyond Good and Evil but gets bogged down with the polemics of conceptual schemes and relative perceptions. The freedom to think. To think beyond the box. To throw one's body into the painting. To think with the feelings. Is this a possible form of morality?

In Dante's ethics, reason and will should control passion. Lust allows passion to subvert reason and will.

According to a note (p. 557) in Allen Mandelbaum's translation of Dante Alighieri's The Divine Comedy, "...true or 'refined' Love was a quality of noble lovers...true Love had been presented as necessarily accompanied by nobility of heart, that is by virtue... Francesca goes on to define Love as an irresistible mutual passion (line 103) [of Canto V of the Inferno"], thus blaming Love as a universal force personified in the terms of contemporary courtly poetry, masking her own responsibility for her damnation..."

And this takes us back to the issue at hand. The appreciation of Beauty as the foundation of right behavior. Right behavior being the happiest course of action for the individual and for the group. Without a lot of bloodshed and shame. Something beautiful. Donne's line: Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind. Not a bad metaphor for meditative absorption. Rigpa.

Rigpa. According to Wikipedia: In Dzogchen teaching, rigpa (Tibetan: རིག་པ་, Wylie: rig pa; Skt. vidyā; "knowledge") is the knowledge of the fundamental ground or Buddha-nature. The opposite of rigpa is marigpa (avidyā, ignorance).

Knowledge of the ground. Schelling raises the question of man's place in nature, one that does not serve any systematic purpose. Evil introduces a necessary imbalance into the system of the world, that this is the origin of life, yet is chaotic, dissonant, and a threat that attempts to turn system into a servant.

Ground in contrast to existence; darkness in contrast to light; retreat in contrast to unfolding; and, finally, intelligence, the emergent rationality, the word. "Vitality" becomes the good, the highest value in this system.

Schelling attempts to reconcile God's necessary nature with his freedom. In their introduction to Schelling's Philosophical Investigations into the Essence of Human Freedom, Love and Schmidt state, "God plays a delicate balancing act in his own self-revelation, which may (as conditioned by the ground) and must not (as somehow overcome this condition) end in a disastrous contraction back into the ground."

Compare this to Longchepa's Dzog Chen analysis of the ground. Here I quote from page 66 of David Germano's introduction to his Poetic Thought, the Intelligent Universe, and the Mystery of Self: the Tantric Synthesis of rDzogs Chen in Fourteenth Century Tibet (a doctoral thesis at the University of Wisconsin – Madison) which is a translation and commentary on Longchenpa's The Treasury of Words and Meanings. Germano comments, on page 66:

While spontaneous presence itself forms a shimmering mandalic panorama utterly devoid of materialization, duality, or ignorance, the key lies in the emergent capacity for self-reflection and awareness deriving from the Ground's compassionate resonance, which in that instant of the Ground-presencing's manifestation is suddenly confronted by this swirling play of rainbow-colored lights. In this single instant, this capacity for awareness can either self-recognize the lights as its own self-presencing and hence in the second instance become liberated as a Buddha, or fail to self-recognize the lights and hence inexorably move towards the dualist creation of the Other as it strays into dualistic existence as a "sentient being." This split at the Universe's first instant is expressed as the "freedom" of transcendence in contrast to the "straying" of cyclic existence, and hence it is said that the indeterminate, neutral Ground-presencing can either serve as the "foundation of freedom" (in the case of recognition) or the "foundation of straying" (in the case of non-recognition).

So, Buddha nature in Dzog Chen parlance and God in Schelling's conception teeter on the edge of presence. The difference in interpretation is between a divine being risking a return to anarchy and an experience of self-recognition by a transcendental state of cognitive emptiness. This teetering is the enigma of phenomenal existence. Perfect. Or not.

In the Dzog Chen (Atiyoga) view, the essence of mind is emptiness; its nature is to manifest; and its resonate energy is compassion. This spontaneously present and clear, primordial wisdom is the nature of mind and the universe. It is free from concepts and duality, and when one's mind unites with this primordial wisdom it can be said that one has attained Buddhahood.

According to Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche (1938-2018):

When this illusion [of duality] is cut through the individual experiences his or her own condition as it truly is, beyond all limits of form whatever. To realize this is to realize the 'Dharmakāya', or 'Body of Truth', better rendered as the 'Body of Reality as it is' ...Infinite, formless energy (Dharmakāya) manifests at the level of the essence of the elements, which is light, as non-material forms only perceivable by those with visionary clarity (Sambhogakāya), and at the level of matter in apparently solid material forms (Nirmānakāya).

So, by means of these examples, an oral introduction is given by the master to the Base, and an explanation is made of the way in which it manifests as the three modes of energy. This is the open secret, which all can discover for themselves.
(The Crystal and the Way of Light, Routledge & Kegan Paul, New York & London, 1986, page 67-68.)

According to Vairotsana (8th c. CE.) in The Great Garuda in Flight (Eye of the Storm: Vairotsana's Five Original Transmissions, translated by Keith Dowman, Vajra Publications, Katmandu, Nepal, 2006, page 18-19):

Analyzed it is nothing—letting it be, fine exaltation;
it is truly invisible, yet it gratifies every need:
the master, innocent of self and other, a treasure trove;

the happy isles, revealed in selfless compassion.

Unmoving within, it is nothing that can be found within
And turning outside, it cannot be imaged or isolated;
Neither extruding nor intruding, this selfless compassion
Is inalienable—it abides here timelessly.

Compare this to the metaphysical connection of Between God and things in Schelling, or at least as Heidegger interprets Schelling (Schelling's Treatise on the Essence of Human Freedom, Martin Heidegger, translated by Joan Stambaugh, Ohio University Press, Athens, 1985, page 123):

The Being of the existing God is becoming in the primordial simultaneity of absolute temporality, called eternity. The being of things is a becoming as definite emergence of divine Being into the revealedness of opposites still concealing themselves. The thinghood of things is so little determined by an indifferent objective presence of material bodies that matter itself is conceived as Spirit. What "we" feel and see as matter is Spirit which has congealed into the extended gravity of inertia.

After all the hierarchies, after all the palaver, after all the cups of tea, how are we to know how we are to behave?

Here is a poetic essay into the history of descriptive (precept) ethics:

(I owe a debt of gratitude to Wikipedia. Forgive me the lack of footnotes.)

Is it possible to have knowledge of what is right and wrong?

Socrates admonishes us to look inward towards our humanness, not towards the world—

Character is the key to virtue
If we can reach our full potential
Become real, we will do good, says Aristotle

Self-realization is the key to virtue
For Stoics, peace of mind is the goal
The inviolate will is the means to this goal

Freedom from attachments is the key

Fulfilling the momentary desire or pursuit
Of spiritual bliss is the principal of Hedonism

“Eat, drink & be merry! Fear not death!”
Mohists promote the benefit of all under heaven
And eliminating harm to all under heaven

Confucians emphasize relationships
As the most important consideration in ethics—
To be ethical we do what our relationships need

Nonviolence towards all sentient beings
To find happiness and the causes for happiness
Discipline is the key of our Buddhist virtue

“You may wind up in another’s shoes
In the next incarnation—be selfless
And kind,” say we Hindus

Moral responsibility is the key to Heaven for Muslims
“Keep God in your heart and the world in your hand”
God grants us the faculty to discern good from evil

Love, grace, mercy, and forgiveness due to sin.
With divine assistance, we Christians are called
To become virtuous in both thought and deed

Go to the Bible, to the wisdom narratives
To answer Judaic moral questions—note the Dynamic interplay between law and ethics

From a Consequentialist standpoint,
A morally right action produces a good outcome—
“The ends justify the means”

Utilitarianism argues the proper course of action
Maximizes a positive effect, such as “the greatest happiness
Of the greatest number,” according to Bentham

Kant argues that we must act from duty—it is not
The consequences but the motives that are important
And the only real good is a good will

Pierce, James, and Dewey, pragmatists, believe

We should emphasize social reform over attempts
To account for consequences, individual virtue, or duty

Postmodernists study the conditions of actions—a simple
Alignment of concepts and actions is impossible—
Accept the messy nature of humanity as unchangeable

So, where does this leave us? Is it possible to have knowledge of what is right and wrong? As Webster Hood says, “It seems that the best we can do is to admonish everyone to be nice.”

Back to Germano’s introduction to Longchenpa’s Treasury of Words and Meanings:

Longchenpa then turns his attention to the authentic identity of this “Ground” (which is closely related to Heidegger’s conception of “Being” and Jantsch’s notion of the “Universe”) with an emphasis on showing how its pure vibrant nothingness can give rise to the wild variety of worlds we currently experience, which he presents in terms of the key dyad of its “original purity and spontaneous presence”, and its expanded (and equally important) triune identity as “its essence, nature, and compassionate resonance”. “Original purity” signifies the Ground’s utter emptiness wherein no-thing at all can be said to exist (“totally purified by any materialization from the very beginning”), while “spontaneous presence” signifies the Ground’s inherent dynamism which serves as the pure source-potential of everything that comes to exist. The Ground’s utter emptiness and openness is in perfect union with its spontaneously dynamic light energy, such that its emptiness is inherently dynamic and luminous, and its luminosity is thoroughly empty and unmaterialized—the two aspects are merely conceptual isolates abstracted from a unitary seamless reality.

Logical enough. Not possible to test this empirically. Logic suffices this far. But one can’t do Dzog Chen with concepts. Intellectual intuition is the key. Here, I turn to F.S.C. Northrup (via Wiki). A wiki elf posits:

One early claim by Northrop in Ch. 2 of "The Meeting of East and West" was that Eastern Thought in general (really most applicable to Chinese thought) is that Eastern Thought deals with the world as an “undifferentiated aesthetic continuum.” That is, reality is all connected and unified, not separated into distinct objects (undifferentiated continuum) and is in reality qualitative as perceived (aesthetic = perception, but later related to theory of art). Some Chinese have dismissed this as racist and simple-minded. Others have embraced it as a correct characterization. What Northrop contrasts with it in the west is an abstract, mathematical or formal conception of reality along with an atomistic conception of reality as fundamentally separate objects. Concepts are in the west “by postulation,” while in the East “by intuition.”

A meditative experience of bliss-emptiness. Not a thought—resonate compassion as an intellectual-physical intuitional experience of the Ground as an undifferentiated aesthetic continuum. Resonate compassion as the aesthetic foundation for right behavior. That Beauty.

Once I had a rough draft of the idea in my consciousness, I began to see the difficulty of composing this idea? How present the idea formally, keeping poetic license and multi-value word games to a minimum? I read more Heidegger (Poetry, Language, Thought); I read Kant's Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics; I read Schiller's On the Aesthetic Education of Man; I read Creative Meditation and Multi-Dimensional Consciousness by Lama Anagarika Govinda; I read The Embodied Mind: Cognitive Science and Human Experience by Francisco J. Varela, Evan Thompson, and Eleanor Rosch. I even read the long version of Dumas' The Count of Monte Cristo, not that it had anything to do with this idea, but it was a beautiful story when fully told. I reflected on my readings, and I did mindfulness-awareness meditation.

How was I going to formulate my feeling that a meditative experience of emptiness is an aesthetic experience? And not only were they analogous but there was a trail of thinking leading out of the Platonic tradition through Schelling to Heidegger to my poetry?

Logical positivism to the rescue. Knowing full well that if I might be positing a false premise and thereby wind up proving most anything, I proceeded to (1) looking to the authorities, even as a weak form of argument, to see if there was any consistency in their thinking on a subject that can only be verified subjectively; (2) to satisfy myself that my personal meditations were on par with these authorities in quality, if not in complete stability, and so confirm their conclusions myself; (3) build a framework that would bridge the gap between eastern and western thinking on this idea, defining terms and giving concrete examples. I had recently come out of retreat. I had the courage.

In the next stage of the saga, I went to Ellensburg, Washington, a town with which I have had a forty-year connection. I came to visit my family and decided to move back to this valley of peace and plenty. I attended The Northwest Philosophy Conference at Central University, home of the Wildcats, in November of 2014. I went not to beard the philosophers but to see what the contemporary mind-set is like. If I was going to convince anyone that mindful-awareness meditation has a convergent connection with aesthetic appreciation and has been realized within the western philosophical tradition I would need to structure my argument within the context of the history of ideas.

I would begin with Descartes—his tree of knowledge, metaphysical roots, trunk of physics, branches of ethics, aesthetics, teleology, and so forth. I would move to Leibniz's theodicy and God's plan for the human race, that the Good is an evil servant of God and not an individual human's responsibility—to Kant, taking a radical step and seeing that the Good is man's responsibility, that humans can make evil decisions—to Schelling accepting Evil as necessary, much like Goethe's notion in Faust Part 1, that God knows what's what and wants Faust to know Him, and Mephistopheles is a puppet helping Faust have this experience. For Schelling, Evil is a dissonance in God, a tension between God, Nature, and Man. Nietzsche kicks God out of the equation with his exclamation “God is dead!” and falls into existential despair. Once the language analysts and the deconstructionists got through with the history of ideas, the logos was floundering and philosophy seemed to be as dead as ash. However, Heidegger trudged on, asking, “Why is there anything at all and not just nothing?”

Descartes’ methodology set science on a firm footing, and the mental path of history went the way of science in a big way, and even Schelling (as suggested by Žižek in one of his lectures) might have contributed to the concept of dialectical materialism and the eventual rise of global capitalism, but if this trend is to be modified and mindfulness-awareness meditation is to be a pedagogical tool for a wisdom ethic and not just a means of stress reduction, I must show that this form of meditation is a method to experience the ground of the philosopher’s God, and that this “God” is the same as resting in Dzog Chen rigpa (in contrast to sems, or conceptual mind). The problem is, of course, that these are subjective experiences, and each philosopher-meditator will be on their own.

I attended lectures on German Idealism in the early 19th century, as well as lectures on Nietzsche and the practice of his “gay science.” I could see that Fichte was hitting a wall looking for things-in-themselves, Hegel was dissolving in a cult of the self, and only Schelling could see that metaphysics did not need to be a study of things-in-themselves but could be about our spontaneous understanding of things. His question “Why is there something rather than nothing?” shifts the focus from metaphysics to ontology and aesthetics. Therefore, I had three points to make: (1) find an ontological convergence between Dzog Chen and a western stance, say existentialism or phenomenology; (2) determine the relationship between meditation and art; (3) then, ask if there could be morality in the aesthetic order. Because this is a cross-comparison between eastern and western concepts, my question becomes six-fold. It is never simple. Still, I will apply Occam’s razor to the best of my ability.

Morality in the Aesthetic Order

1. Ontological

Thought is Resolved in Pure Vision

The intangible samadhi that lacks any field of meditation,
Pristine, simple, intrinsic gnosis,
Consumes all events in consummate resolution,
And all experience spent, itself is consumed.
Since the consuming or non-consuming is resolved in absence,
Its existence as ineffable is never in question.

What is, is a vast nonreferential,
All experience consummate, 'no mind!'
And that is the yogin's delight!

A single field of dynamic space
Integrating past, present and future,
An unbroken holistic field of reality,
This is the arena shared by buddhas and masters of gnosis.

Argument by authority in the blue tights: Martin Heidegger (1889-1976), German philosopher, here quoting Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926), a Bohemian-Austrian poet in support of his concept of "Being," (Poetry, Language, Thought, translated by Albert Hofstadter, Harper Perennial, New York, 2001).

First, a stanza from a poem by Heidegger:

In thinking all things
Become solitary and slow.

Patience nurtures magnanimity.

He who thinks greatly must Err greatly.

(From The Thinker As Poet)

Next to Heidegger's poem I posit this quote from Rilke to be found in Heidegger's essay, What Are Poets For? (Page 105):

You must understand the concept of the "Open," which I have tried to propose in the elegy [here referring to the eighth of the Duino Elegies, in such a way that the animal's degree of consciousness set it into the world without the animal's placing the world over against itself at every moment (as we do); the animal is in the world; we stand before it by virtue of what peculiar turn and intensification which our consciousness has taken. [Rilke goes on,] By the "Open," therefore, I do not mean sky, air, and space; they too, are "object" and thus "opaque" and closed to the man who observes and judges. The animal, the flower, presumably is all that, without accounting to itself, and therefore has before itself and above itself that indescribably open freedom which perhaps has its (extremely fleeting) equivalents among us only in those first moments of love when one human being sees his own vastness in another, his beloved, and in man's elevation toward God. (Translated by Maurice Betz, Rilke in Frankreich, Reichner, Vienna, 1937.)

Argument from authority by the one in the maroon robes: Jampa Dorje (1941-), Poet-Printer-Yogi-Monk (A Book from Luminous Peak, Vol. 13, Luminous Peak Notebook, 2011.)

There is a parcel of space
That, once, was an "I" —
Now, there's just the sky

3 precepts of psycho-cosmic real estate
Happy wherever
Happy wherever
Happy wherever

A yogi can be happy in hell

2. Meditation and Art

In the red tights: the dynamic trio from MIT, Francisco J. Varela, Evan Thompson, and Eleanor Rosch. (The Embodied Mind: Cognitive Science and Human Experience, MIT Press, Cambridge, 1993, page 24.)

How can this mind become an instrument for knowing itself? How can the flightiness, the nonpresence of mind be worked with? Traditionally, texts talk about two stages of practice: calming or taming the mind (Sanskrit: shamatha) and the development of insight (Sanskrit: vipashyana). Shamatha, when used as a separate practice, is in fact a concentration technique for learning to hold ("tether" is the traditional term) the mind to a single object. Such concentration could eventually lead to states of blissful absorption; although such states were assiduously cataloged within Buddhist psychology, they were not generally recommended. The purpose of calming the mind in Buddhism is not to become absorbed but to render the mind able to be present with itself long enough to gain insight into its own nature and functioning. (There are many traditional analogies for this process. For example, to be able to see painting on the wall of a dark cave, one needs a good light protected from the wind.) Most present-day schools of Buddhism do not practice shamatha and vipashyana as separate techniques but rather combine the functions of calming and of insight into a single meditation technique. As the meditator again and again interrupts the flow of discursive thought and returns to be with his breath or his daily activity, there is a gradual training of the mind's restlessness. One begins to see the restlessness as such and to be patient with it...Eventually meditators report periods of a more panoramic perspective. This is called awareness.

In the blue trunks: Lama Anagarika Govinda (1898-1985) German painter-poet and expositor of Tibetan Buddhism and Buddhist meditation. (Creative Meditation and Multi-Dimensional Consciousness, The Theosophical Publishing House, Wheaton, Illinois, 1976, page 151-152.)

Art and meditation are creative states of the human mind, both are nourished by the same source, but it may seem that they are moving in different directions: art toward the realm of sensuous and outward manifestation, meditation toward inner realization and integration of forms and sense-impressions. But this difference pertains only to secondary factors, not to the essential nature of art and meditation.

Meditation is neither pure abstraction nor negation of form except in its ultimate illimitable stages. It means the perfect concentration of the mind and the elimination of all unessential features of the subject in question, until we are fully conscious of it by experiencing reality in a particular aspect or from a particular angle of vision.

Art proceeds in a similar way: while using the forms of the external world, it does not try to imitate nature, but to reveal a higher reality by omitting all accidentals, thus raising the visible form to the value of a symbol, expressing a direct experience of life.

3. Is there morality in the aesthetic order?

Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805) Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man, Robert Audi, The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy:

In “Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man” (1794/5), Schiller examines the relationship between natural necessity and practical freedom and addresses two problems raised by Kant: How can a creature governed by natural necessity and desire ever become aware of its own freedom and thus capable of autonomous moral action? And how can these two sides of human nature—the natural, sensuous side and the rational, super-sensuous one—be reconciled? In contradistinction both to those who subordinate principles to feelings (“savages”) and to those who insist that one should strive to subordinate feelings to principles (“barbarians”), Schiller posited an intermediary realm between the sphere of nature and that of freedom, as well as a third basic human drive capable of mediating between sensuous and rational impulses. This third impulse is dubbed the “play impulse,” and the intermediary sphere to which it pertains is that of art and beauty. By cultivating the play impulse (i.e., via “aesthetic education”) one is not only freed from bondage to sensuality and granted a first glimpse of one’s practical freedom, but one also becomes capable of reconciling the rational and sensuous sides of one’s own nature. This idea of a condition in which opposites are simultaneously cancelled and preserved, as well as the specific project of reconciling freedom and necessity, profoundly influenced subsequent thinkers such as Schelling and Hegel and contributed to the development of German idealism

To illustrate the difference between awakened mind and discursive mind, a Zen Master says, “When you have Satori you are able to reveal a palatial mansion made of precious stones on a single blade of grass; but when you have no Satori a palatial mansion itself is concealed behind a simple blade of grass.” (Lama Govinda, ibid., p. 157.)

With spacious intuition of the brilliant emptiness of reality, unconfined gnosis is a seamless infinite openness,
And free of belief, all ideation dissolving, all things converge in the matrix of the gnostic dynamic.
The blissful ground and a happy mind blended,
Inside and outside the one taste of pure mind,
This is the vision of reality as the consummate way of abiding.

The man in the maroon robes (from Jampa Dorje’s Worldly Dharmas, by Bouvard Pécuchet, Kapala Press, Santa Fe, 2014, Vol. 1):

Now, back to Berkeley. It was here that Jampa first encountered Tibetan art. For Tibetan artists, the definite outline is of utmost importance in their thangkas, which are paintings very often depicting deities used as support in meditation practices. Precise and highly proportional use of form, line and color allow these artists to render their experience of visionary realms. The line is a spiritual energy. This was so for William Blake (1757-1827) as well. Blake takes a radical stance on this issue.

“The great and golden rule of art, as well as life, is this: That the more distinct, sharp, and wirey the boundary line, the more perfect the work of art; and the less keen and sharp, the greater is the evidence of weak imitation, plagiarism, and bungling.” (from “A Descriptive Catalog &c. No. XV, Poetry and Prose of William Blake, ed. By Geoffrey Keynes, Nonesuch Press, 1967)

Blake detested what he termed, “the infernal machine called Chiaro Oscuro,” which he equated with the mechanistic universe as conceived by Bacon, Newton and Locke— the

Blake would not have approved of the painting of light developed by the Impressionists, after the invention of photography, and much of modern art would be anathematized. He might acknowledge Hellenistic traces in the lines of Picasso, Dali, Matisse and Cocteau, though their forms would be repugnant to him.

The “definite outline of the almighty” may be ore the province of spiritually oriented art, where the source of illumination comes from within, and the use of shadow and perception of depth are not so critical. Blake had his art roots in Gothic art, and he was reaching across the horrors he perceived in the so-called Age of Reason towards a vision of a pure land.

But I am beginning to write on Blake, and there is a chapter on him yet to come. What of Jampa and Lu Garcia? They are artists working after the Second World War, 1945 into the present. Much of what was disturbing to artists of the first half of the twentieth century— the acceleration of events, the fragmentation of culture after WWI, the increasing industrialization of nations, the astonishing flow of information, the effects of applied science, and the relativity of values— all this is taken pretty much for granted by artists now.

During the days of urban renewal, in the ‘60s and ‘70s, architects were faced with an esthetic challenge to create buildings that would fit into neighborhoods where there was a mishmash of styles. So, they borrowed a bit of this and a tad of that and came up with an eclectic blend, to be known as post-modern. This using mixed media and the incorporation of a variety of painterly styles in one work is evident in the pictures of many contemporary painters and certainly in the work of collage and assemblage artists.

William Blake would consider Jampa’s art ugly, the work of Fumble and Bungle, but Jampa is undeterred. He admires Blake’s bold pronouncements, his iconoclastic beliefs, his view of the eternal artist and the imaginative principal, and above all his perseverance in an age that dismissed his art as old-fashioned, when in fact it was modern and revolutionary.

I am still writing about Blake. Let me turn decisively to the work of Jampa. Most of Jampa’s artwork is signed “Rychard.” Jampa says, “The y can simply replace the i in Richard, and the pronunciation stays the same, or it can have a French affectation and be Reechard, as you wish.” Here is his artist’s statement from Rychard’s Assemblages, D Press, 2007:

I contemplate and move objects around until things "fall into place." I like there to be a fit, and I try to interlock the shapes of the objects to give structure to the piece—an architecture of mind—keeping nails, glue, wire, staples, screws, welding to a minimum. I bring disparate objects together—eggshell Styrofoam, curtain lace, blurry photos and plastic water pipe—hoping for a most fortunate accident of composition that will capture the tension between chaos and order. Look for nothing behind the junk.

Although there are examples of combining found-objects and of pasting together paper images in the folk art of the 19th century, as well some mixed media in the early work of Picasso, it is Kurt Schwitters, a German artist of the 1920s who is considered the father of collage. He created what are known as "Mertz," after finding a scrap of newspaper torn from the word "commertz." The idea that this lowly fragment of commerce could be recycled into the economy intrigued him. That which is rejected, ignored, cast aside, is still a part of the system, and the artist threads it back into the fabric of society. This art was considered decadent, meaningless by the Third Reich, so Schwitters's work was burned, and he had to flee to America.

I am not a trained artist. I took printmaking and a class in drawing from Terrance Choy at the University of Alaska in the early 1970s. Mainly, I have hung out with artists that eat, drink and dream art, and I've watched them work and sat in cafes and walked the streets, talking with them. I go to museums and galleries and look at the pictures. I was 19 when I went to my first art show at the San Francisco Modern Museum of Art and saw Robert Motherwell's blue collages of Gualois cigarette wrappers mixed with paint. I saw an exhibit of Brancusi and Giacometti sculptures and a retrospective of Kandinsky paintings. All of these exhibits strongly affected me—the "teariness" of collage in the work of Motherwell, the solid presence of the Brancusis, the organic economy of the Giacomettis, the ethereal precision of the Kandinskys. Later, other famous and not so famous artists would have effect on me. Luis Garcia's collages, for example, revealed to me that materials are everywhere, and I still strive for the sense of alignment I feel in his work.

I have used the skills of a carpenter, a plumber, a printer, a painter—trades I work at and enjoy—to make my artworks. The best carpenter is the one who can hide his errors. However, here I like to see the "errors," the crustiness, the broken, bent, wrinkled, burnt, twisted materials, the wire, thread, nails, and the seams in the cut paper. I paint with junk, exploring space, positioning this "trash" to reveal its overlooked beauty.

INTERVIEW WITH JAMPA DORJE by Bouvard Pécuchet

I made my way, wearing snowshoes, along the faint traces of a trail in the deep snow to Luminous Peak, the cabin where Jampa is ensconced. He welcomed me with a big smile and a hot cup of tea.

Bouvard: This tea has an interesting flavor. What is it called?

Jampa: Lapsang Souchang. It comes from the Fujian province of China. Smokey, some people say it tastes like boot polish. I have some other choices, if you'd prefer.

Bouvard: No, this is delicious, but don't yogins avoid becoming attached to fine teas?

Jampa: Well, there's no reason for throwing away good tea. Enjoy your tea, and then we'll get down to business.

Bouvard: Do the Tibetans have a tea ceremony like the Japanese?

Jampa: Not that I know of, but they do use tea as an offering, and I have heard that, if there is a limited amount of tea available, the first steeping is called the “nirmanakaya” and the second is the “sambhogakaya” and the third is the “dharmakaya.” Each kaya, or dimension, is progressively more rarified, until it is tasteless. (Jampa laughs.)

Bouvard: Can you tell me about your assemblages?

Jampa: Assemblage is a process of making a painting by combining found objects. Assemblage has its roots in collage, and collage has its roots in folk art. Picasso added real newspaper and pieces of a guitar to one of his paintings. Schwitters used found materials. Philip Whalen said, “Kurt Schwitters tore it all into COLOR.” Abstract Expressionists, like Jasper Johns and Robert Rauschenberg took assemblage to new heights of composition and absurdity. It is not all to be viewed in a serious vein. There is also humor in this work, although some critics see it as “anti-art” or “the end of art.” A gallery curator told me that my Cowboy Funk pieces were too dirty to hang on her walls. The outdoors does cling to my combines, which is another name for these objects, and I feel they are akin to environmental artworks.

Bouvard: Many of your assemblages hang on sheds and fences. I saw a number of these, as I walked towards your cabin. Do you see them primarily as belonging outdoors? You also make collages and boxes, right?

Jampa: Yes, the collages and boxes are made of more delicate materials. They are more intimate. The junk pieces I like to see outside. They highlight an otherwise overlooked structure, and the various objects around old buildings seem to become a part of the assemblage itself.

When I was hanging out with Don Webster, an artist I knew in Aptos, I was sweeping up a bunch of debris into a wooden box, and I decided to pour in some glue. Why not? Of course, it didn’t hold together, but it was a start. If you want a combine to hold up under the force of the elements, you have to give some consideration to how you construct it. I often begin by laying the parts I have collected on the ground and leaving them. I rearrange them a few times, taking into account how they fit together, structurally and esthetically, and how I am going to eventually mount them, what wire, nails, screws will be used.

Once I am satisfied with my composition, I start with the background level and begin to build, changing things as necessity dictates, as the materials demand. It never comes out as I planned, but that is half the fun. I do tend to over work my pieces, not to let well-enough alone, to get cute, “to put a bird on it.” Literally.

At the gallery I mentioned earlier, where the curator was concerned about the crustiness, the rustiness, the flakiness, I did get three works accepted in a community show and won first, second and third prize in the mixed-media category. I asked the judge, later, why the one piece received third place, and she told me that the little hand-crafted bird I had added to a projecting piece of metal was silly. Maybe so, maybe not; I had added it because I didn’t want someone to poke out their eye. There’s a bird in Rauschenberg’s Canyon. Maybe, if I had spray-painted my bird black, it might have flown.

Bouvard: Where do you find your materials? How do you choose?

Jampa: There’s a lot of junk out there to choose from, too much really. I set rules for myself, like I will only pick up pieces of stuff I find along the roadside on my morning walk.

Occasionally a piece “presents” itself and goes to complete a work still unfinished. People give me things: “Jampa could use this,” they say. Sometimes, I find a huge stash of materials, on a ranch or in a junk pile. I get excited. I want it all; but I settle on pieces that interest me. Another rule is to use things from other projects I’m working on, say, doing some plumbing or fixing a garage door. I may incorporate the broken parts or the left-over materials in my art.

When I lived on a ranch near Ellensburg, Washington, there was a mound of junk out in the desert. The guy I worked for had problems, work pressures, girlfriend pressures—he was a man in a mid-life crisis—and he used my shoulder to cry on. We had a good working arrangement, a rent-free house and a monthly salary, but the added “psychologist” part on my days off had not been part of the original deal, and it became oppressive. I continued to do my chores, but I took out my frustration by covering a large shed with junk. This was my first big work. My boss sold the spread, and the man who bought it was going to bulldoze the “Tack Shack,” as it was called, but his wife said it was a treasure, that she loved it, and it was saved from destruction. Kind of a happy ending, unlike the fate of the wall in The Horse’s Mouth.

The opening scene of Sam Albright’s video, The Collage Artist, takes place in front of the Tack Shack. I appear in a black tweed overcoat and fisherman’s cap, working on my art. I get in a battered GMC van and drive down 4th Parallel Road towards Ellensburg. Mt. Rainier can be seen above the Manastash Canyon, and there’s a great shot of a hawk cutting the air in front of the van. The video follows the activity of an artist preparing a retrospective art show. There are three parts: the ranch scene and trip to town; a café scene, shot in the Four Winds with a part that is an interior monologue; and a final, Chaplinesque scene of Chris Shambacher and myself, accompanied by Craig, Chris’s three-legged dog, carrying a mysterious box around town. The video was shot just prior to a show I had at Gallery One with Don O’Connor and Bruce McNaughty. If you go to the gallery at my dPress website, you can see photos of this show by Julie Prather.

Bouvard: Jampa, what is the source of your inspiration? What makes you create?

Jampa: Oh, that’s harder to describe than how I make my art. You know that I am also a writer. I go back and forth and sometimes combine both mediums. When the poetic muse takes a vacation, I do visual art. They’re related activities. In collage, you cut and paste images; in poetry, you take an image from your mind and put it, in the form of a word, on the page. The brain might but the impulse to make art is the same. Both are means of expression, like giving birth to something that wasn’t there beforehand, an urge to procreate. There’s a time for flirtatious-like curiosity with an idea or image, and then of conception, gestation and delivery—even before I begin to work—then, you have to nurture this baby. The actual making of the poem or collage involves all the trials and hopes and disappointments of getting this baby to grow into a being, but I don’t like this analogy much. Maybe the drive to create is something more transcendental, like communing with the Absolute. Or it might be totally mundane, like wanting fame. If you think too much about this, you’d never do it.

Bouvard: What might set you off, be a catalyst?

Jampa: Anything. As Borges points out, everything has its poetry, its beauty, even if you can’t see it. A blank page is a formidable thing, perfect in its blankness, but once you make a mark on it, you are committed. The work moves, changes, and you can find yourself lost, weary and confused. Stop. Leave it. Sleep on it. It's easy to botch things. Or, go on. It's your call. Sometimes, from a mess, a masterpiece emerges. I recall Henry Miller's short story, "The Angel Is My Watermark," where an image of an angel appears in his ruined watercolor. After he had tried several ways to save it, he tried scrubbing it in the bathtub; and presto!

Bouvard: There's a question I've wanted to ask someone who is both a creative artist and a meditator. Do you find there to be a conflict between these two activities?

Jampa: I didn't quite finish answering your last question, but I think what I have to say will lead to that, ok?

Bouvard: Of course, go ahead.

Jampa: William Blake said a work of art consisted of three parts: one part came from myth, a part from the art tradition, and a part from your own genius. It is my view, a work of art also has its source in three locations: in an outside place, an inside place, and a secret place. By the "outside," I mean the context for the work to be done, perhaps a commission or an upcoming show, and this imposes a deadline. This pressure acts as a stimulant. The "inside" is your own personal standards and the methods, the skillful means, you have developed to make art.

For example, my way of writing is described in My Process (dPress, 2002, see Vol. 8 of The Collected Works of Richard Denner). I explain how I write into the book. I use linked text boxes in a computer program to create a book format. The open pages "call out" to be filled; and from here, it is out of my hands. The book becomes an editing process. I print out a copy, sew it up, edit, and print it again, until I am satisfied. There are usually pieces left over, and these start the next book in a series. The "book" is never done. It is done when you put a frame around it and call it done. With my assemblages, I may begin with a frame and fill it. Or, a wall seemingly calls me. I make a few strokes, and the composition begins to expand and take on a life of its own. This is why it's hard for most people to dedicate themselves to art, to live in the moment and give up their structured lifestyle.

Then, there is the "secret" place that is a source for the work of art. I may be inspired by a beautiful woman, or I may find I am writing or making a picture to please a friend. I discovered recently that I wrote many poems to Allen Ginsberg and Jack Spicer. I want to be in that Circle of Hell where Dante put the poets. As Jack once said, "Poetry is a conversation among the dead, and the poets get it second hand." It is in this secret place that strange knowledge comes to the artist, and it is here that meditation is helpful.

Is there a conflict between making art and meditation? My experience is that there is room for both, that they are compatible and enhance each other. Aspects of the creative process are meditative: there is the focus of shamatha, of maintaining a mindful presence in your work; and there is a kind of seeing, or insight, that arises from the vipashyana aspect. It is impossible for the mind to reach complete stillness when making art, especially with writing, where logic and the law of contradictions are in play, yet the mind stream is channeled, directing the flow of energy toward realization of what is really real.

After a session of meditation, where the discursive mind is given rest, I find my creativity enhanced, my hand steadier. The continual search for bliss in visionary fantasy, the god-like power of creativity, the revelatory ecstasy of epiphany are a mistaken direction to pursue, if you want lasting transcendental wisdom. Finally, there is no meditation; all dualistic notions are subsumed under equanimity, in a simple state of awareness.

Blah, blah, blah!

If you have brought your art onto the path, then it is a form of practice, and your view, your practice, and how you carry this out in your life are unified, were always a unity. You need to develop confidence in this. It doesn't mean having a Big Ego. You develop what the Tibetans call Vajra Pride, which also requires you to maintain humility and compassion for others. You don't need to be acknowledge by others. You acknowledge yourself. I could go on, but I think this is a good place to stop.

Bouvard: Thank you, Jampa.

Jampa: You are entirely welcome. Blessings. May the two-fold accomplishments of mine and others be of benefit—no, that's not it—through the two accumulations, may the two-fold benefit of mine and others be accomplished.

Now, to write a summation.

Beauty in the moral order.

It appears to me, now, that my novel idea that there is morality in the aesthetic order evolved from a misreading of The Critique of Aesthetic Judgment by Immanuel Kant.

In this Critique, Kant says the beautiful is “what pleases immediately.” (Great Books of the Western World, Encyclopedia Britannica, Chicago, 2nd edition, 1990, Kant, Volume 39, page 478b.) He says further that “Taste is the faculty of estimating an object or a mode of representation by means of a delight or aversion apart from any interest. The object of such a delight is called the beautiful. He goes on to define the beautiful as “that which, apart from concepts, is represented as the Object of a Universal delight” (ibid. 479d). Next, Kant notes that we mistakenly believe that because the beautiful can be appreciated by others as well, the beautiful is deemed to be inherent in the object.

An aesthetic analogy could be drawn between Plato’s “ladder of love” and Kant’s meditation on beautiful objects representing symbol of grander ethical considerations;— the Greek word kalon appears in contexts meaning “beautiful” (as in a person’s face) and at other times means “noble,” which is a complement to goodness (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, “Plato’s Aesthetics,” online).

From fair objects to fair ideas to fair forms. According to Kant, we receive sensuous pleasure from an object (Kant uses “a rose”), in the second moment, our taste, developed by way of our cultural upbringing, gives us the concept that the beautiful can be validated objectively when we agree with others with similar taste. The logical judgment, based on taste (or a canon of acceptable values of the beautiful), that roses in general are beautiful is founded upon the original subjective, individual evaluation that roses are agreeable, and we are delighted when the inner and outer representations are united, making the beautiful universal. In this, we are mistaken. The only attributes the good and the beautiful have in common, other than the beautiful, in a limited sense, being a symbol of the good (ibid. 546d) is in the delight. The beautiful pleases, whereas the good is esteemed and has objective worth (ibid. 479b).

Kant concludes The Critique of Aesthetic Judgment by an appeal to moral ideas as the basis of taste: "For only when sensibility is brought into harmony with moral feeling can genuine taste assume a definite unchangeable form" (ibid. 549a). This, for Kant, is the role of beauty in the moral order.

Kant and Schiller.

Another auspicious error. In the process of developing my idea, I ordered books from amazon, and I found a copy of Friedrich Schiller's On the Aesthetic Education of Man (translated by Reginald Snell, Dover, Mineola, New York, 2004), a book which I had thought was to be by Friedrich Schelling. The title had intrigued me, and I had not looked closely at the spelling of the author's name. But Schilling's ideas were in line with my own.

In his introduction to Schiller's book, Snell says (ibid. p. 8), "It was a casual remark of Kant's that art compared to labour may be considered as play, that originally prompted him to develop his own theory of play..." Schilling believes that the aesthetic experience can resolve the conflict between the intellect and the senses, as well as between nature and reason. He believes that art can be a means to educate us and bring us into the realm of moral harmony, and he proposes a union between the spirit and the sensuous through the play impulse. By play, Schiller means "everything that is neither subjectively nor objectively contingent, and yet imposes neither outward nor inward necessity. As our nature finds itself, in the contemplation of the Beautiful, in a happy midway point between law and exigency, so, just because it is divided between the two, it is withdrawn from the constrain of both alike." (Fifteenth Letter, ibid. p.78).

In the eighteenth letter, Schiller writes, "Through Beauty the sensuous man is led to form and to thought; through beauty the spiritual man is brought back to matter and restored to the world of sense" (ibid. p.87), and In the twenty-fourth letter (ibid. p.120), Schiller writes, "Contemplation (reflection) is Man's first free relation to the universe which surrounds him. If desire directly apprehends its object, contemplation thrusts its object into the distance, thereby turning it into its true and inalienable possession and thus securing it from passion."

My daughter Dr. Lu Auz, who teaches art history at the Memphis College of Art, brought to my attention a book she uses in her classes, The Invention of Art: A Culture History by Larry Shiner (University of Chicago Press, Chicago & London, 2001). In chapter 7 ("From Taste to the Aesthetic") of part 2 ("Art Divided"), there is a section entitled "Kant and Schiller Sum up the Aesthetic." In discussing Schiller's belief in the redemptive power of fine art, Shiner says:

In the genuine work of fine art there is already a harmony of freedom and necessity, duty and inclination, the "spiritual drive" and the "sensuous drive," a union that Schiller calls "play." The artist-genius embodies the transcendent truth about life in the work of art as play, yet this truth is not a specific content but resides only in the form of the work. “In a truly successful work of art the contents should effect nothing, the form everything, for only through form is the whole man affected...only from form is there true aesthetic freedom” (Schiller 1967, 155). True fine art never aims at some particular result like stimulating emotions, teaching beliefs, or improving morals. Only when people renounce all such instrumental aims and exercise “a disinterested and unconditional appreciation of pure semblance” will they have “started to become truly human” (Schiller 1967, 205).

[Shriner references the Oxford 1967 Clarendon Press edition Schiller’s On the Aesthetic Education of Man: In a Series of Letters.] It is this “disinterested and unconditional appreciation of pure semblance” that Schiller speaks of that I plan to equate with the compassion that arises during calm abiding meditation in the Buddhist tradition.

Morality in the aesthetic order.

Leaving Kant and Schiller, it is my contention that morality (using “morality” in its widest sense) is inherent in the aesthetic order and that the need for moral precepts to enable the individual to make right decisions on how to act is unnecessary. It is assumed that having knowledge of moral precepts educate us to act ethically, however when situations demanding moral judgment arise suddenly, there is not time to make moral reflections before we act.

My close friend, Webster Hood, introduced me to a book written by his teacher: The Inward Morning by Henry C. Bugbee Jr. (Bald Eagle Press, Pennsylvania State College, 1958). Bugbee is writing a journal, and on Friday, September 26, 1952, he asks, “...can we assume that we may deliberately place ourselves in the vein of the categorically imperative flowing of our lives? Can we credit the possibility of realizing the root meaning of being under obligation, wither in thought or in action, according to methods of inquiry or of action?” He notes that “for purposes of ethical inquiry of the conditions of justified action can hardly be due to the following of ‘a proper method of inquiry.’” On Saturday, September 27th, Bugbee notes, “It would seem that faith, in the sense of a certain openness and trustingness on our part, is as essential in ethical reflection as in action.”

It is my contention that there are “procedures” that can be followed, but that these procedures are not typical aids to reflection in the Western philosophical tradition. Instead, these procedures are those developed in the Buddhist yogic tradition.

Meditation as an aesthetic experience.

Meditation is a mental practice, and if compassionate resonance can spontaneously affect our actions without recourse to the logical cognitions of moral imperatives, it must arise within the confines of the meditative experience itself. The training in meditation must make this reflexive, if it is to be any more than a half-hearted attempt at being good. In Tibetan Buddhism, this process is kick-started through Guru Yoga. It requires the student, as Bugbee suggests, to have faith. But not a faith without investigation of the teacher; indeed, the student must observe the teacher to be a 24/7 dharma machine and a master of meditation. Then, and only then, should the student follow the teacher, for there are psychological dangers in the process of deconstructing the encrustation of indoctrinated moral precepts and cosmological concepts through the radical yoga of tantric Buddhism (Vajrayana).

Utilizing peaceful absorption, the meditator experiences well-being, or bliss, as the natural expression of emptiness, and this experience resonates as compassion. In Secrets of the Vajra World (Shambhala, Boston & London, 2002) Reginald A. Ray, says that the 8-fold path (the Forth Noble Truth of Gotama Buddha),

...is divided into shila, ethical behavior; samadhi, meditation; and prajna, wisdom or insight into the nature of things. In one sense, these three are progressive: one must first cultivate a life that is marked by kindness and good intentions towards others, a life that is ethically well grounded. On this basis, one may then enter the practice of meditation. And, having developed a sound meditation practice, insight begins to arise. In another sense, however, shila, samadhi, and prajna may occur in any order and mutually reinforce each other in a variety of ways. For example, from one point of view they unfold in reverse order: it is insight (prajna) into suffering that often motivates people to enter the dharma in the first place. Then they practice a little meditation (samadhi) and realize, perhaps for the first time how self-centered and unkind they are to others. Based on this, they may attempt to be more ethical in their behavior (shila).

After completing the prerequisite trainings to establish the physical side of meditative stability (calm abiding), I practiced Guru Yoga, which involved hours of deep imagining (visualizations) and the repetition of specific sound formulas (mantras). These rewire the neural circuitry of the brain in a dramatic way. Imaginings become understandings. In this sense, there is an analogy with Heidegger's phenomenological scrutiny of the historical ontology of man's Being, but the yogic path is more rigorous and extends beyond an intellectual understanding into a final experiential condition. For example, the yogi or yogini can learn to dry sheets that have been soaked in freezing water while he or she sits in meditative equipoise. Such a practice is not for the faint of heart and must be learned in stages. All tantric teachings require a formal, ritual transmission by the lama (wang), along with verbal explanations (lung), without which the instructions in the manual are meaningless at best and could well lead the uninformed practitioner into dangerous psychological territory. Here is the bare outline of the yoga of inner heat from A Treatise on the Stages of Training in the Profound Path of Naropa's Six Dharmas by Tsongkhapa Lobzang Drakpa, translated by Glenn H. Mullin, Snow Lion, Ithica, NY, 1996, page v. After the preliminary practices are completed, the following systematic teaching is given:

.A. The essence of the basic principles in the guidelines of the path; .1. The essence of the path; .a. Arousing the four blisses by means of drawing the vital energies into the central channel; .i. The inner condition of the meditations on the inner heat doctrine; (.A.) Meditating upon the inner heat in order to draw the vital energies into the central channel; (.1.) How to meditate on the inner heat yoga; (.a.) Meditating by means of visualizing the channels; (.b.) Meditating by means of visualizing mantric syllables; (.c.) Meditating by means of engaging the vase breathing technique; (.2.) Having meditated in this way, how to cause the vital energies to enter, abide and dissolve with the central channel; (.B.) Having brought in the energies, the methods of arousing the four blisses; (.1.) The nature of the signs that arise, and the blazing of the inner fire; (.2.) How the bodhimind substance are melted and the four blisses induced; (.3.) The manner of meditating upon the innate wisdom.

At each stage, I found myself confused by the recent instructions, but as I progressed with the training, I realized that I could not have advanced without having accomplished the previous stage of training. This understanding gave me confidence in the training and renewed my faith in and devotion to my teacher. Tulku Sang-ngag once asked me, "What do you think I want from you?" and I answered, "Devotion." He shook his head in the negative and said, "Courage." In my training, I had begun with faith and devotion, moved forward with courage, gaining more confidence because of my accomplishment, and this in turn renewed my faith and devotion. The attentive contemplation pertaining to the attributes of the outer guru, in time, brought about an awareness of the same attributes being a part of myself. Inner guru and outer guru became one.

During the stage of learning vase breathing, where I was required to suspend the breath for increasing longer periods. I had analyzed my resistance to this practice as connected to my fear of drowning. As a boy at summer camp, in northern California, I had nearly drowned in the Guwala River. Connected to this experience, I remembered a 1998 sci-fi film, Sphere, (directed by Barry Levinson and starring Dustin Hoffman, Sharon Stone, and Samuel L. Jackson), where the members of a crew of marine biologists, living at the bottom of the ocean, learn to ingest water infused with chemicals into their lungs so that they could withstand the ocean's pressure and explore an alien spaceship imbedded in the coral. The expression of surprise on Sharon Stone's face, when she discovered the validity of breathing with her lungs full of water, reinforced my determination to proceed. My ability to develop this yoga would not be accomplished through reasoning (in fact, the process is counter-intuitive), nor through the process of intellectual judgments (or only in so far as I could judge my progress). It had to be done with the basic cognitions of faith and courage.

Overcoming fear, I shifted my understanding of my yogic process of "holding my breath" to one of simply "not breathing." A subtle meaning, here, but it had a profound effect. The first method required an effort of my muscles, and the second did not. "Not breathing” requires no effort of the body but does require an effort of the mind. Checking Wikipedia (“Control of Ventilation”):

Control of ventilation refers to the physiological mechanisms involved in the control of physiologic ventilation, which refers to the movement of air into and out of the lungs. Ventilation facilitates respiration. Respiration refers to the uptake of oxygen and the removal of carbon dioxide. Under most conditions, the partial pressure of carbon dioxide controls the rate of respiration. The most important function of breathing is gas exchange (of oxygen and carbon dioxide). Thus, the control of respiration is centered primarily on how well this is achieved by the lungs. There are four main centers in the reticular formation and other parts of the brainstem that regulate the respiration rate. Inspiratory centre - reticular formation, medulla oblongata. Expiratory center - reticular formation, medulla oblongata. Pneumotaxic center - various nuclei of the pons. Apneustic center - nucleus of the pons. The first two centers are present on the medulla oblongata whereas the last two centers on the pons region of brain... Ventilation is normally controlled by the autonomic nervous system, with only limited voluntary override.

I sat on my meditation mat and did my preparatory practices. My breathing slowed and then ceased. I overcame my fear of “not having enough air” and continued to sit. After twenty minutes, allowing for a few adjustments of returning to the non-breathing state but not considering this a break in the practice, I stabilized the practice and remained in calm abiding. The candle on my altar went out. It was a night without a moon and intensely dark. I was sitting alone in the mountains with no one nearby, and I was feeling well-being in the cosmic void. No angst, no anguish, no agony. Luminous cognizance. My face before I was born. My original face. The face Dante Alighieri speaks of in line 108 of Canto XXXI of Paradiso, after peering into the image of the white Rose during his visit to the Tenth Heaven, the face which Jorge Luis Borges mentions in his poem “Of Heaven and Hell” (Selected Poems, Penguin, NY, 1999, translated by Alastair Reed, page 157):

and the sheer contemplation of that face—
never-changing, whole beyond corruption—will be, for the rejected, an Inferno, and for the elected, Paradise.

Brain research into evolutionary psychology finds that, with the development of the mammalian brain, a kind of cognition with feelings occurs, allowing mammals to have social and nurturing behaviors. Again, Wikipedia (“Triune Brain”):

...the "neocortex" represents that cluster of brain structures involved in advanced cognition, including planning, modeling and simulation; the "limbic brain" refers to those brain structures, wherever located, associated with social and nurturing behaviors, mutual reciprocity, and other behaviors and affects that arose during the age of the mammals; and the "reptilian brain" refers to those brain structures related to territoriality, ritual behavior and other "reptile" behaviors.

It is pointed out that the triune model of the brain is an oversimplification for complex neurological mechanisms, but through my yogic practice, it seemed as though I was beginning to “talk” to my reptilian brain, and my success in accomplishing the yogic vase breath brought useful insights and gave me confidence for the next stage, the practice of yogic heat, which involved yet another subconscious brain function.

We are closer to knowing how we know. If with the development of the mammalian brain, mammals could “think” with their feelings, we have the biological-ontological foundation for an aesthetic morality.

Reveries of a eudaemonist

Part 2 of A HISTORY OF A NOVEL IDEA

Today, I can trace one tendril of thought to Bertrand Russell not being able to teach at Cal because of his free-thinking and his eye for the ladies. I had just finished reading Why I Am Not a Christian, bought in a Sausalito bookstore on a weekend outing with my drinking buddies, and I was intrigued and asked my dad, a man in his late fifties, born in 1900, what it was about and was told that Berkeley was overrun by the fifth column. Whatever that meant. I knew then that I needed more knowledge. Felt Russell’s frustration when he asked his mother “What is matter?” and she told him, “Never mind.”

Another tendril: “Dzog Chen can’t be done with concepts!” I took the lama literally. As a post-structural ontological purist, I would never contaminate the I-in-itself with the Thing-in-itself, unless, that is, I wanted to eat a burrito.

Walking in the shoes of German philosophers. Trying on time and space as a pair of sensible shoes and walking along University Avenue. Turning into the campus, wearing hiking boots, I climb Hegelian heights. Sitting on a bench in Fichtian loafers...flapping with Schelling’s flippers underwater...sprinting in Nietzschean racing shoes...slogging along in Schopenhauerian hip boots...

Those banners along the main drag, “What Did You Do Today?” Colored flags. A tiny piece of the Geist admonishing us to make ourselves relevant. I wonder if these inspirational banners that ask “What Did You Do Today?” with a photo of a CWU alumnae and their job title (Civil Servant, Nurse, CEO) could be a part of Hegel’s concept of Geist. Spirit. Mind. A purpose to history. All these graduates of the institution, having been prepared to enter the outside world with knowledge of the arts and sciences, will leave the walled city to further the purpose of history to realize Reason. Or be exploited.

Jumping to Marx in my 12-league boots. What would Marx think of a yogi sitting in his cave? A waste. Unless he can come out of Samadhi and ease our suffering, otherwise, just selfishness. My lama said, "If you stay in your cave too long, you will become a cave bug."

Time and space. I put my left foot forward in space, followed by my right foot in time, trying not to step on a crack and break my mother's back. She's been dead for years, and I'm still doing this. Clicking my fingernails to the palms of my hands in a one-two-three-four rhythm in rhythm to my steps, like a baseball player getting ready to bat. Moving into concentration mode. Feeling time. Time, a superstition, but still double checking my positing of my will. Willy-nilly-ness, the idea-in-itself in all its glory. The Force is with me, today. My Chi is chillin' while my Tao is doin'.

But to eat that burrito I'm taking us back to Descartes. Descartes' proof of God based on the idea of perfection not being found in the world, so the idea must come from somewhere. Ergo, God.

Professor Altman finds the argument an intriguing one. Melanie, his student, wants the idea of perfection to be accessible to her without the need for an Old Guy with a white beard. The discussion moves to the term Infinity. Melanie finds the source of her concept for Infinity in the positing of its counterpart, the finite. She thinks she sees Infinity implied in mathematics, the Fibonacci sequence, but Professor Altman tells her this is another attempt to compound parts to reach a whole, in this sense Infinity is a hole that can never be filled. All the same, where does that thought come from?

I suggest Infinity is a point where parallel lines meet; where tautologies snicker behind their masks; where $n+1$ is 1; where new buddhas arrive, and old buddhas return to the ground of being.

I posit the term "Completion"—a reference to Dzog Chen's Great Perfection. A view of the nature of mind and the nature of the moment. Everything perfect. I get a blank look. I take a poet's approach and reference Blake's "Infinity in a grain of sand, Eternity in a wildflower", but Professor Altman claims that is just poetic license. Me thinking it is revelation...but no matter. This would lead to a discussion of intellectual intuition, and we're discussing Descartes, so, no matter. And we are in Professor Altman's office after class. We had heard his initial lecture on Schopenhauer, and there are still unanswered questions. There always are.

Invocations of Geist.

Rainbows of the five Buddha families.

Earlier, Professor Altman had shown the philosophy of Kant branching in two directions: one branch to Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, to Marx, and one branch to Schopenhauer and Nietzsche. Professor Altman says there are neo-Hegelians in Pittsburg.

Where Hegel goes, so goes Fichte and Schelling. Schelling, Boehme, Blake plunging to the heart's core, while Hegel soars thru the stratosphere in the Red Baron's biplane.

After Kant, to the extent that dogmatists critiqued themselves and understood the limits of their thinking, scientists continued to reach for the-Thing-in-itself, while poets critiqued themselves in negative light and plunged into unreason following their imaginative energies, William Blake waving his arms above his head as though he had been attacked by bees.

Except for Coleridge, who took opium to get negative delight. Negative Capability. For Keats beauty is truth, not truth is beauty. Somewhere I read that that line in his "Ode to a Grecian Urn" was written especially for the eyes Samuel T., who Keats felt placed Truth higher than Beauty. Angels and Demons in brain wars.

And these 18th century capital nouns. Reason. Spirit. Truth. Like handling concepts the size of boxcars and moving them around one's neurological confines with the deftness of a stage magician.

The next thing.

Correspondence between Holly and Jampa:

Dear Jampa

Nice to hear from you. I fear I dropped the ball again and I apologize, though I'm glad to hear you finished your project. You're much faster than I! I'm about midway through my art essay, and wrestling with Schopenhauer these last few days. I look forward to reading yours. I have been thinking that in the terms that you were looking at it - from the perspective of morality - the disinterested observer does have a different, perhaps more meaningful aspect. Thinking of it maybe as a state worth striving for rather than as a present condition. A judge should try to be a disinterested observer, right? There are times when it is a useful (and potentially true) ethical position. In terms of art, I guess I've just been more interested in how hopelessly entangled it all is - the observer, the artwork, the artist. Also, studying Dewey. We'll see where it goes - I've still got a way to go in sorting it out.

I came across this passage of Schopenhauer today and it made me think of you because, while he's talking about absorption in the art object, he might as well be talking about meditation, it seems to me. I was curious what you would think of that. He too touches on the brief nature of this state of mind.

This freeing of knowledge lifts us as wholly and entirely away from all that, as do sleep and dreams; happiness and unhappiness have disappeared; we are no longer individual; the individual is forgotten; we are only pure subject of knowledge; we are only that one eye of the world which looks out from all knowing creatures, but which can become perfectly free from the service of will in man alone. Thus all difference of individuality so entirely disappears, that it is all the same whether the perceiving eye belongs to a mighty king or to a wretched beggar; for neither joy nor complaint can pass that boundary with us. So near us always lies a sphere in which we escape from all our misery; but who has the strength to continue long in it? As soon as any single relation to our will, to our person, even those objects of our pure contemplation, comes again into consciousness, the magic is at an end; we fall back into the knowledge which is governed by the principle of sufficient reason; we know no longer the Idea, but the particular thing, the link of a chain to which we also belong, and we are again abandoned to all our woe.

That course sounds great! I'm envious. I think I am trying to slowly, painstakingly train myself in philosophy but it is slow going and I often wonder what it would be like in a proper university environment. I will be curious to know how it goes.

H.

Hi, Holly

A History of a Novel Idea baffles most people—"lovely placement of philosophical passages that i don't understand in the story line" or "I don't get this post-modern stuff" or "nice punch at the end" or a discussion about emptiness/bliss/aesthetic and art theory/observations, like you, hopelessly entangled in all the art - the observer, the artwork, the artist - back to myself, studying now the process Duchamp used to develop "the large glass", making collages, and reading Kant's Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics.

I can see three themes going here: (1) aesthetic contemplation/detachment, (2) void/emptiness and will, and (3) aesthetic morality. I share your concerns, and I hope this helps the two of us to make sense of all the materials we have been trying to tie together and the various excursions our minds are taking as we sort and evaluate it. Thank you for the Schopenhauer and Dewey quotes; I have been avoiding both thinkers. I think I need to look at the three themes separately, first.

The directions of our pursuits are a bit different. You attempting to write philosophically/critically on art and me using what I'm calling "aesthetic contemplation" as a bridge from the West to meet "mindfulness-awareness meditation" from the East, hoping thereby to reveal a new way to understand morality, which in turn can help us make wise decisions.

The first paper I sent, "A History of a Novel Idea," attempts to track the development of the seed of the idea over a period of years, an idea that resurfaced lately in the question "Is there morality in the aesthetic order?" The word "novel" in the title has two meanings—you and I are alike in the way we are both "philosophers" and "artists," and it is interesting how we think differently in these realms, or at least I do—so, the last piece, "Echoing Keats," is more of an attempt to write a rigorous philosophy piece without sacrificing my historical approach to the idea and the way it came to the page.

"Echoing Keats" begins with a confession that I misread Kant's Critique of Aesthetic Judgment but notes that, indirectly it led me to read Schiller's On the Aesthetic Education of Man. I love the way Kant thinks, his a priori synthetic ramblings, the form without the content, the content without the form, but I could not find the link I was looking for to hold together the ideas I was proposing.

Schiller is a poet, and in the process of digesting Kant against the backdrop of the French Revolution, he was bold enough (poets!) to suggest "disinterested and unconditional appreciation of pure semblance" as a way to lay the foundation for a new approach to right behavior that he believed could lead to an Aesthetic State (and by this he means not just a mental state but a political state. High hopes he had. He seems to falter when he realizes that only an elite few could attain this "detachment," and it is here, I am sure you are right, he's another Enlightenment dummy when it comes to women. From my readings in Shriner's Invention of Art, I see the cultural bias of the late 17th and early 18th century philosophers would believe that only white, property-owning men could attain this level. "Race" is just becoming to be considered a concept, and "Art" is becoming "fine art", and we're calling arts, such as vase painting and embroidery, "crafts" or "womanly arts"—not fine arts.

I find a new book, Psychology of Contemporary Art by Gregory Minissale, Cambridge U Press, NY, 2013.

The blurb by Gerald Cupchik says, "...The author explores experimental aesthetics, neuroaesthetics, and cognitive psychology in depth, incisively pointing out problematic issues in each area related to processes underlying the creation and appreciation of contemporary art. A pleasure to read."

Unfortunately, it's hardback and $99, but my friend Philippe has a copy, and so I read chapter 3.9.

"Losing oneself: mind wandering." Minissale has a theory about art viewing. The chapter begins, "It might be possible to understand how certain artworks help us to think about different subject positions and selves, and they might even help us to think differently about the concept of a self, but how far is it possible to "loose oneself" in contemporary art?" He suggests "mind wandering"— although usually thought as negative in education could be useful in art understanding. He quotes studies that show that creative insights occur during resting states of the mind, and he shows that "absorption does not have to be premised on logical, linear procedures, egocentric experience or direct observation of the artwork, even though the artwork will provide the occasion for the mind to wander." Another study shows that "mind wandering is most pronounced when there is a lack of metacognition or self-awareness and executive control." Further on he says, "If one assumes that art can cause the mind to wander and also to be attentive, this would create different kinds of absorption: being absorbed and knowing one is being absorbed, where the latter is more likely to be as a disinterested or distance experience [my emphasis], and there are aesthetic arguments that can be mobilized in favor of one kind over the other."

This brings me to aesthetic contemplation and meditation being aesthetic experiences, the work of the artist communicating "whatever" to arrive at truths of Being, the beautiful, the ugly, the harmonious, the inharmonious, just as a meditator uses a statue, a mandala, a rock, or the breath to find well-being, bliss/emptiness.

But this is not what is experienced by yoginis or yogis. Emptiness is experienced as "bliss" (which is often explained as "well-being," so as not to confuse the term as a form of "ecstasy," or in another reading, the essence of Being is emptiness, but its nature is to manifest, and it resonates compassion (meant in a very ontological, if not metaphysical sense). As regards emptiness, the Nyingma School holds "emptiness" to mean impermanence. Schopenhauer is, at first, abhorred by being awash in “nothingness”, then shores up his courage with compassionate will-less-ness; but a sense of being dissatisfied seems to linger in his bliss.

For Schopenhauer, the will turns in upon itself and becomes detached, and the reason to feel compassion is to transcend a meaningless universe, as will has no teleological purpose. Different from Buddhism, where the thrust of Buddhist psychology is to be a better person.

Dewey is modern. The quote, “When artistic objects are separated from both conditions of origin and operation in experience, a wall is built around them that renders almost opaque their general significance, with which esthetic theory deals” reminds me of Heidegger’s holistic approach that entails, the artwork, the artist, the art observer (and critic-philosopher), and the making of the art are all critical to the understanding of art. “The artist make the art, and the art makes the artist.” But note that Dewey is concerned about how, when the continuity is broken, “a primary task is thus imposed upon one who undertakes to write upon the philosophy of the fine arts.” Well and good, but this may be a problem for the “philosophic” mind with an article to write and not for the general art observer from Hoboken. Here “aesthetic appreciation” is more neutral. What is that damn “Fountain” of Duchamp’s about? Is it art? Is it beautiful? What’s it doing there?” And the mind wanders and comes back...the mind becomes a still mind and a mind wandering...the attention shifts...there’s sustained focus for a moment...then the mind wanders. This is like what goes on during a meditation session, only there is only the focus on the breath...and moments of sunyata (emptiness).

3. Aesthetic morality and Schiller’s concept of play.

Here’s a piece on Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805) by Robert Audi from the Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy:

In “Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man” (1794/5), Schiller examines the relationship between natural necessity and practical freedom and addresses two problems raised by Kant: How can a creature governed by natural necessity and desire ever become aware of its own freedom and thus capable of autonomous moral action? And how can these two sides of human nature—the natural, sensuous side and the rational, super-sensuous one—be reconciled? In contradistinction both to those who subordinate principles to feelings (“savages”) and to those who insist that one should strive to subordinate feelings to principles (“barbarians”), Schiller posited an intermediary realm between the sphere of nature and that of freedom, as well as a third basic human drive capable of mediating between sensuous and rational impulses. This third impulse is dubbed the “play impulse,” and the intermediary sphere to which it pertains is that of art and beauty. By cultivating the play impulse (i.e., via “aesthetic education”) one is not only freed from bondage to sensuality and granted a first glimpse of one’s practical freedom, but one also becomes capable of reconciling the rational and sensuous sides of one’s own nature. This idea of a condition in which opposites are simultaneously cancelled and preserved, as well as the specific project of reconciling freedom and necessity, profoundly influenced subsequent thinker such as Schelling and Hegel and contributed to the development of German idealism.

Jampa

Dear Jampa

Re your emptiness of created things, emptiness of uncreated things, ultimate emptiness, emptiness of limitlessness, emptiness of dispersion, emptiness of primary nature, emptiness of selfhood, emptiness of things, emptiness of non-being, emptiness of self-nature, emptiness of the non-being of self-nature.

That is a fascinating list. In my essay (on futility, which I just finished) I hold Nagarjuna up against this passage from Schopenhauer. Schopenhauer is really a pill, but he sure is a beautiful writer.

That we abhor annihilation so greatly, is simply another expression of the fact that we so strenuously will life, and are nothing but this will, and know nothing besides it. But if we turn our glance from our own needy and embarrassed condition to those who have overcome the world, in whom the will, having attained to perfect self-knowledge, found itself again in all, and then freely denied itself, and who then merely wait to see the last trace of it vanish with the body which it animates; then, instead of the restless striving and effort, instead of the constant transition from wish to fruition, and from joy to sorrow, instead of the never-satisfied and never-dying hope which constitutes the life of the man who wills, we shall see that peace which is above all reason, that perfect calm of the spirit, that deep rest, that inviolable confidence and serenity, the mere reflection of which in the countenance, as Raphael and Correggio have represented it, is an entire and certain gospel; only knowledge remains, the will has vanished. We look with deep and painful longing upon this state, beside which the misery and wretchedness of our own is brought out clearly by the contrast. Yet this is the only consideration which can afford us lasting consolation, when, on the one hand, we have recognized incurable suffering and endless misery as essential to the manifestation of will, the world; and, on the other hand, see the world pass away with the abolition of will, and retain before us only empty nothingness. Thus, in this way, by contemplation of the life and conduct of saints, whom it is certainly rarely granted us to meet with in our own experience, but who are brought before our eyes by their written history, and, with the stamp of inner truth, by art, we must banish the dark impression of that nothingness which we discern behind all virtue and holiness as their final goal, and which we fear as children fear the dark; we must not even evade it like the Indians, through myths and meaningless words, such as reabsorption in Brahma or the Nirvana of the Buddhists. Rather do we freely acknowledge that what remains after the entire abolition of will is for all those who are still full of will certainly nothing; but, conversely, to those in whom the will has turned and has denied itself, this our world, which is so real, with all its suns and milky-ways—is nothing.

H.

I recognize the quote from Schopenhauer, now that I have taken Matt Altman's class on 19th century German philosophy. For ten weeks, one hour each day, five days each week, Professor Altman rigorously drove home the tenants of the philosophers that evolved their understanding of mind and reality from Immanuel Kant's "Copernican Revolution" in thought, his critical idealism. As a Buddhist, I had the hardest time with Schopenhauer. His ideas seem to be the most influenced by Buddhism, but he only comes to the door of understanding the concept of emptiness without passing through, and to critique Schopenhauer, I had to follow a long passageway.

Central Washington University is in Ellensburg, Washington. In the stairwell of the Language and Literature Building, I came upon Professor Altman's advertisement posted on the bulletin board.

Sounds great! Why not take the class? See if I can piece together the fragments of Eastern and Western Philosophy I know. Remember having read Kant's Prolegomena, but I'm unfamiliar with Fichte and Hegel. Want to learn more about Schelling. Brush up on my Marx. Borges often quotes Schopenhauer, whose quotes are very literary, and I enjoy reading Borges. I've heard that Schopenhauer was influenced by the wisdom teachings of the East. Another link, maybe. Not sure I could say "I know my Nietzsche", but I've read some. The Birth of Tragedy still reverberates with me. I reread Kierkegaard's Fear and Trembling and his The Sickness Unto Death back to back with The Birth of Tragedy and The Genealogy of Morals in the three-month retreat I took after my three-years practicing the Dzinpa Rangdröl. Wonderful reads.

Talked with Professor Altman, and it was a go. For $5, a senior citizen can get on the roster, and the fee comes with a library card.

Later.

Kant had a revolutionary insight about time and space being forms of consciousness, the means of how we know what we know. Fichte felt the “a priori” beat and turned it into a song and dance routine, and then Hegel expanded the tune into an opera fit for the Festival at Bayreuth.

As much as one may criticize the airy, emptiness philosophy of Buddha as the abstractions of an exotic subjectivist, Buddha does not point to the dialectical operations of Geist as the subject of his inquiries. Buddha is talking about sentient beings that are actually suffering, not abstract beings in a historical process.

I’m still thinking that Schelling is the feminine side of a Jungian equation, and Hegel is the masculine. We are abandoning our aesthetic feeling for things in lieu of mental wanderings, wisdom obscured by skillful means rather than united.

Another day.

In the ‘60s, I was a young Marxist. Maybe I was just a Young Hegelian, but I thought Leary’s “Tune in, turn on, drop out!” slogan was the basis for a philosophy, and that my critique of society, my desire for non-violent action, ecological consciousness, alternative foods, communes, and so forth were the path to follow. Psychedelics seemed a viable method to deconstruct my Hegelian mindset. As the Furry Freak Brothers said, “Dope will get you through times of no money better than money will get you through times of no dope.” Marx’s theory of alienation revealed to me that I needed more than a job; I needed the “oceanic feeling” of love.

The Geist of Berkeley in the ‘60s.

LEARY PROCLAIMS TUNE IN TURN ON DROP OUT (1965)

I had already dropped out
And turned on to my own tune.
Radical Dzog Chen spontaneously arose
In America and Europe in the Sixties
And Berkeley was ground zero
With street poets the vanguard.

We had no discipline, but we had l’esperit.
We had no patience, but we had the grit.
Body—we believed in Free Love.
Voice—we believed in Power to the People.
Mind—we believed Make Love Not War.

We saw the body as a temple.
We opened the doors of perception,
And we abused 4:4 time
To where you couldn’t march to it.

You may scoff, but we found power
In the streets, enough to stop a war
And set the establishment on its ear.

A day or two later.

Arthur Schopenhauer wrote On the Basis of Morality as a response to a question posed by the Royal Danish Society of Scientific Studies in 1837 for an essay contest. The question was, "Are the source and foundation of morals to be looked for in an idea of morality lying immediately in consciousness (or conscience) and in the analysis of other fundamental moral concepts springing from that idea, or are they to be looked for in a different ground of knowledge?" Schopenhauer submitted the only entry to the contest in July 1839, but failed to win. On January 17, 1840, the society published a response to the essay, in which they refused to present him with the prize, claiming that he had misunderstood the question. (Wikipedia: On The Basis of Morality.) Ah, Maya!

Schopenhauer is grim. Pessimistic. Kierkegaard feels Schopenhauer is not pessimistic enough. Schopenhauer is happy when he wins one essay prize in Denmark and then is mad when he doesn't win another.

And the Will as what's driving things. Blind force! Still, this is a Newtonian universe Schopenhauer is describing. The universe of a sleeping man. Will rather than compassion at the heart of things. Yes, Schopenhauer acknowledges compassion as knowledge that redirects the path of will, but this is still the universe moving through time and space in sequential fashion. No sense of the spontaneousness of Brahman-Vishnu-Shiva, arising-sustaining-dissolving quantum dance of energy or the uncontrived, timeless, spontaneous here-and-newness of Samantabhadra. Schopenhauer is intriguing, convincing, but I don't believe a word of it.

"Logic is consequently to be understood as the System of Pure Reason, as the Realm of Pure Thought. This realm is the Truth as it is, without husk in and for itself. One may therefore express it thus: that this content shows forth God as he is in his eternal essence before the creation of Nature and of a Finite Spirit." Hegel says this in his "General Concept of Logic" (Nineteenth Century Philosophy, edited by Patrick Gardiner, The Free Press, 1969, p. 67). He's just trying to show us how to think outside the Aristotelian box.

Dear Reader, this may seem obvious to you, or it may not.

The truth-as-it-is.

Royal goal.

OK, Crazy to some! But...

Look at this bit from Longchen Rabjam (14th c. Dzog Chen yogi-monk):

[A Treasure Trove of Scriptural Transmission: a Commentary of the Precious Treasury of the Basic Space of

Phenomena. Padma Publishing, 2001, Junction City, California, p. 171.]

Therefore, it is in the naturally occurring state without transition or change / that the most majestic perfection of goals is experienced as nonduality. / The total freedom of the three realms—the ultimate meaning of the nonduality of samsara and nirvana— / is the fortress of dharmakaya, the nature of being that arises inherently from within, / such that it is completely pure like space, yet is in fact beyond all metaphors.

Longchenpa is speaking of non-duality within the awakened mind. In his commentary to the above stanza in his poem, he gives the following instructions to the meditator on how to reach the understanding of this stage of meditative absorption: “Given that the true nature of phenomena and mind itself are inseparable, on the strength of your becoming familiar with this and refining it in your own experience, a state of realization that is like space arises naturally from within; this is reefered to as “building the vajra fortress of dharmakaya”—that is, this realization is spontaneously present as great perfection beyond limitation.

I turn again to ye olde Wikipedia, where I pick a bit of data and cut and paste.

SAMSARA. Repeating cycle of birth, life, and death.

NIRVANA. The imperturbable stillness of mind after the fires of desire, aversion, and delusion have been finally extinguished.

THREE REALMS. In Buddhism, the three worlds refer to the following destinations for karmic rebirth: DESIRE REALM, WORLD OF FORM, FORMLESS REALM. These three worlds are anciently identified in Hinduism and appear in early Buddhist texts.

DHARMAKAYA. One of the three levels of manifestation of the Buddha in Mahayana Buddhism. Dharmakāya constitutes the unmanifested, "inconceivable" aspect of a Buddha, out of which Buddhas arise and to which they return after their dissolution. Buddhas are manifestations of the dharmakāya called nirmanakaya ("transformation body"), which is the historical, relative level.

Sambhogakaya has been translated as the "deity dimension", "body of bliss", or "astral body".

Reginald Ray, a Buddhist scholar, writes of Dharmakāya as "the body of reality itself, without specific, delimited form, wherein the Buddha is identified with the spiritually charged nature of everything that is." [Reginald Ray, Secret of the Vajra World, Shambhala, Boston, 2001, p. 13.]

Nice, complicated dharma terms that can be interpreted six ways to Sunday. It is the term non-duality that needs to be unpacked. Longchenpa, in the previous stanza, had admonished the reader:

Without any realization of equalness in its naturally occurring state, you may obsess on the word “nonduality” and place your confidence in some state that you speculate has no frame of reference whatsoever. This is truly a mistaken notion—the dark realm in which awareness is not recognized.

It's hard for writers in the Buddhist faith to write without the myth, but Longchenpa is more able than most.

Within the expanse of spontaneous presence is the ground for all that arises. Empty in essence, continuous by nature, it has never existed as anything whatsoever, yet arises as anything at all. Longchenpa says,

Within the expanse of the three kayas, although samsara and nirvana arise naturally, they do not stray from basic space—such is the blissful realm that is the true nature of phenomena. [Ibid. from the section "The Adornment of Basic Space", p.13.]

Kaya. See Three realms.

On Wednesday, May 13 at 5 PM in Black 152, Dr. Michael Fletcher gave a talk titled:

"The Incoherence of Buddhism: A Tourist's Guide"

His preface read: "Buddhism makes a number of initially alarming metaphysical claims, one of which is that persons do not exist. This would seem to make the Buddhist an anti-realist about persons. But that's not all. Buddhism is not only a body of doctrines but also a religious practice, one guided by its own distinctive normative ethic. Buddhist ethics is in large part a moral response to the existence of suffering. But can Buddhism coherently claim on the one hand to be a normative practice, one that recognizes the moral significance of suffering, while on the other claim that, whatever else may be true of our world, ours is not a world containing persons?"

I went to that talk, and I later emailed Dr. Fletcher, who I talked to afterwards, believing that he had been skating on thin ice.

hi, michael, jampa here, the following may be of use to you, thanks for listening to me...

checking on my selves, i find i can have quite a number and quite a number of no selves, as well mainly, the Self is the "I am" (like how Descartes uses the term) which is what the Hindus call "Atman" (a permanent self), but there are divergences in the meaning in some schools of Buddhism, however the emphasis is for the most part on it's unsubstantial nature, the impermanence of it as an entity buddha nature is usually referred to as the true self, but even here it is tricky to pin the sucker down.

the Mahaparinirvana Sutra uses the term Self in order for the Buddha to win over non-Buddhist ascetics, as Buddha says: 'The Buddha-nature is in fact not the self. For the sake of [guiding] sentient beings, I describe it as the self.'

it is at this end of the spectrum that the yogi must pull back from his inward explorations to keep from becoming a cave bug and this alludes to why i cautioned you to be careful with trying to fit the term into a single concept, as there are pedagogical difficulties in guiding students to awakening from their dogmatic slumbers and discover their essential nature, from a practical level, we all have a sense of self, mere selves, social selves, and spiritual selves, each with more or less reality (or none, in the metaphysical sense)

it appears that some Buddhists believe that, while there is no atman, there is a pudgala or "person", which is neither the same as nor different from the skandhas, so your use of "person" in the sense of self holds up, as i was thinking of person more as the incarnation (the embodied mind) with or without a self really, it is selfishness that is the problem, it is the self as a central player that is the false belief, and from this self-centeredness arise negativity—harmful desires, hatred, ill will, conceit, pride, craving, attachment—so how to get it to chill out is the focus of the teaching that will help the student discover the Buddha's nature

Self, or no self, whether or not one has compassion is what is important, being a kind person rather than a selfish one, and it is through meditation that one peels back the layers that seem to be a self that manifests in its essence as emptiness and resonates in conduct as compassion, the skillful means by which the wisdom of emptiness is put into action the fourth noble truth, which is the 8-fold path, is not exactly a set of precepts, in the sense of the biblical ten commandments—they are a series of steps to begin meditation practice the path begins with the first noble truth, there is suffering, which is meant in the sense of things being out of alignment, and the second noble truth, that this state of affairs, this suffering, is due to our ignorance of not realizing that our desires cause us to attach and cling to what is impermanent, and the third noble truth, that suffering can be overcome, leads to the means to accomplish this, and the means to reach wisdom is through meditation by developing mental discipline, ethical conduct, and wisdom in order to begin to meditate, one has to create the right environment: having right understanding means understanding that wisdom and compassion are one, not dry metaphysics, but to begin to develop compassion for all sentient beings with right understanding comes thought, which allows for ethical conduct of right speech, action and livelihood—to arrive here requires mental discipline, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration, that of keeping an energetic will in whatever we do, be it work or meditation, and right mindfulness with regard to the body and the mind, and right concentration, such as applying the breath as a mode of meditation, thus one begins the training

another element in the mix: you must deal with the Trikaya of the Buddha, the three bodies of buddha, the three aspects of buddhahood: dharmakaya (the emptiness aspect of buddhahood); sambhoghakaya (the spontaneously luminous aspect, only visible to realized beings), and the nirmanakaya (that which manifests out of compassion for sentient beings)

and then, Emptiness, and here too there are variations, and if we combine different kinds of emptiness with the various kinds no-selves, the problem is complicated and confusion magnified

Eighteen kinds of emptiness:

CREATIVE MEDITATION AND MULTI-DIMENSIONAL CONSCIOUS BY LAMA ANAGARIKA GOVINDA (Quest Books, Wheaton, Illinois, 1976) from the opening paragraphs of a chapter titled "Concept and Actuality" from which I have removed the Sanskrit (p.37):

The Middle Way of the Buddha—reiterated and reformulated in Nagarjuna's Madhyamika Philosophy and put into practice in the Tantric Sadhanas of the Vajrayana—is based precisely on the denial of anything absolute, by proclaiming the law of dependent and simultaneous origination, in which the elements of both time (causality) and synchronicity (acausality) are combined. Even the term sunyata does not mean "emptiness" in an absolute sense, because when speaking about emptiness, we cannot conceive of or attach any meaning to this word without having at the back of our mind the question "empty of what?" The word "empty," like all words of the human language, is a relational term, just like "high" or "low," "right" or "left." This is clearly shown by the classification of sunyata into eighteen kinds of emptiness: emptiness of inner things, emptiness of outer things, emptiness of inner and outer things, emptiness of emptiness, great emptiness, emptiness of ultimate truth, emptiness of created things, emptiness of uncreated things, ultimate emptiness, emptiness of limitlessness, emptiness of dispersion, emptiness of primary nature, emptiness of selfhood, emptiness of things, emptiness of unattainability, emptiness of non-being, emptiness of self-nature, emptiness of the non-being of self-nature. This list could have been indefinitely extend and has itself been the subject of Immeasurable learned commentaries, which complicate matters even more and keep the intellect more and more busy with concepts of concepts and abstraction of abstraction, until the mind has proved its own utter emptiness and nonexistence.

jampa, here, whomever, hoping this helps

Dr. Fletcher thanked me with a quid pro quo:

WHAT THE BUDDHA GOT RIGHT

Your worst enemy cannot harm you
As much as your own thoughts, unguarded
But once mastered,
No one can help you as much,
Not even your father or your mother.
You are the source
Of all purity and impurity.
No one purifies another.
—Dhammapada

dear michael

started to write a long thing, then thought better of it, knowing professors have so much to read, but here are three areas you might explore in relation to buddhism's concept of subjecthood

MINDSTREAM as the medium or vehicle for maintaining intention without a self, the continuum of consciousness in and beyond incarnation as a physical form

FIVE DHYANI BUDDHAS as a model for personality (in lieu of a self, given the true nature of the individual is their buddha-nature, which the buddha cautions is not a self, and as such is just another concept)

ADI BUDDHA the primordial self-originating buddha

In response to your What the Buddha Got Right, here is a stanza from The Natural Freedom of the Nature of Mind, which is part of Longchenpa's Trilogy of Natural Freedom:

Since everything is but an illusion,
Perfect in being what it is,
Having nothing to do with good or bad,
Acceptance or rejection,
One might as well burst out laughing.

Read The Science Delusion by Carl White. Yikes! I'm on track with my argument for aesthetic morality. Or, at least, I've got my hands on a live wire in philosophy. Romanticism vs Dogmatism.

GOD

God is dead.
—Nietzsche
Nietzsche dead.
—God

Jampa thanks God for all His blessings and for the many, many instructive lessons that he has received. Jampa is grateful for this life, even if, as St. Augustine put it, we are born amid piss and shit. Jampa was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, the better to feed off the offal.

Jampa had kind, steadfast parents, loyal friends, intelligent and beautiful wives, genius children, and enlightened teachers. He has felt Christ with him in his darkest hours helping to restore his soul (Psalm 21). Goodness and mercy have always followed him (Psalm 25). He believes the sins of his youth have been forgiven. The name "Jampa" means lovingkindness, and this quality, by the grace of the Lord, he has come to embody. Praise be!

How does Jampa reconcile his Judeo-Christian faith with that of Buddhism? Jampa claims that it is easier to be a Buddhist and a Christian than it is to be a Christian and a Buddhist. The First Commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," is not a problem for a Buddhist since they do not believe in a creator god. Gotama and other buddhas are men and women who are given respect because they have attained the state of enlightenment, the true understanding of the nature of mind, comprised of luminous cognitive emptiness.

Buddha-mind is beyond description, but the path to enlightenment can be communicated. The Buddhist approach to the meaning of Life is understood within a psychological context, and the metaphysical approach of Christians, with the emphasis on proving God's existence independent of humans, is abandoned. The ontological solution is nothing really exists in and of itself. Even Heidegger's inquiry into "Being" is an etymological tempest in a teapot.

Raised in the Christian faith, Jampa attended, first, a Methodist church and then, Presbyterian churches. He was uncomfortable in church. The light coming through the stained-glass windows was beautiful, but the wooden pews in the Methodist church were as hard to sit on as the sermon was hard to listen to. The pews in the Presbyterian churches were padded. This was a comfort, but the liturgy still seemed interminable. "That man, nailed to a cross, hanging on the wall, he must be in agony," thought Jampa. "Is this what it's all about—torture? I would prefer to sleep in on Sunday morning." He eventually got his way.

Attending church for Jampa's parents was, for the most part, a social obligation, something they felt the family was expected to do. Their true belief system was the Masonic institutions: The Order of Free and Accepted Masons, for men, and The Order of Eastern Star, for women. For young men, there is The Order of DeMolay, and for young women, Job's Daughters. Both Jampa and his sister, Lynda, were initiated, but it didn't take for Jampa—too stuffy. And formal attire was required, and he did not find the girls he was asked to escort to dances attractive. (Dance couples were paired by a drawing of names sent from one lodge to another.)

After a surprise baptism in the basement of the High Street Presbyterian Church, in Oakland, Jampa began to seriously question the whole rigmarole of religion. It is true that Freemasons do not consider their brotherhood to be a religion, more a system of morality taught through signs and symbols, but they do recognize a Supreme Being, who is the "Great Architect of the Universe." Upon acquiring a copy of Bertrand Russell's Why I'm Not a Christian in a Sausalito bookstore, Jampa decided Skepticism was the most sensible course for him to follow.

The doctrine of skepticism, that nothing can be proved absolutely, served Jampa well when he entered the University of California Berkeley and began a serious study of literature and the sciences. Kept his mind open. And when he began to delve into Philosophy, Jampa could suspend judgment and accept the views of diverse thinkers. In both chemistry and physics, the empirical method is the Holy Grail of research, combining as it does the use of reason and experiential data. In literature, all the old gods appear and are carried forward into the present through literary allusions. It seems to Jampa that just as science proceeds to dispel the realm of mystery, poetry and fiction renew the fountainhead.

Jampa was not able to maintain pure skepticism. He mingled the philosophies of the ancients with the moderns and combined mythologies into a form of Hedonism highly spiced with mushy mysticism, after his legendary peyote trip. Poetry became his path, his pride, and his pitfall. The classes Jampa took from Walter Benesch at the University of Alaska in Eastern and Western Philosophy and from Bob Allen in English and Canadian Literature helped him firm the mysticism into a metaphysical foundation for his poems that synthesize visionary consciousness with a social conscience.

This anarchistic shotgun blast of imagery is from “intergalactic69pornoputer,” a selection of Jampa’s book, Islam Bomb (D Press, 1998). It dates to 1972, when Jampa lived in Preston and was decompressing from two intensive years of studying a vast array of subjects. The poem traverses outer space and inner dimensions, hops from the funny papers to the holy scriptures, taps meta-language and mantra, hints at a government of cruelty and a garden of earthly delights. But what exactly is “misononeismystic Presbyterianism”?

Misononeismystic is a made-up word. “Mis” is a prefix that means mistaken, wrong, or simply acts to negate, as in “misprint”; “miso” is a word element referring to hate: “misonism” means the hatred or dislike of that which is new, and “misonomer” is a misapplied name. “Mystic” has a variety of meanings, ranging from pertaining to something spiritually significant to something obscure or mysterious. I would guess that here it refers to someone who has attained insight into transcendental knowledge, a protestant mystic of some sort, one who has reached beyond systems of correspondence. As for the connection with “Presbyterianism,” remember, Jampa was a baptized Presbyterian. Once a Presbyterian, always a Presbyterian.

So, does “misononeismystic” mean anything? Probably not in a literal sense. I think Jampa liked the sound, a kind of linguistic onomatopoeia of philosophical babble. He needed rest from the rigors of argument. He let sounds arise without reference and return to where they came from into sound-emptiness-Buddha speech.

In astrological terms, the planet Neptune links the individual soul to the Godhead. Between 1957 and 1971, Neptune was in the sign of Scorpio, the first house in Jampa’s natal chart. Neptune, according to Lucy Pond (Metaphysical Handbook, Reflecting Pond Pubs., Ellensburg, 1984), is “the planet of illusion/delusion, fantasy, drugs, escapism, spirituality, and supreme faith.” Jampa came of age in the vortex of a time when social values were in upheaval, the Vietnam Era, and he partook of mind-expanding drugs, practiced free love, protested against war, torture and tyranny, and sought spiritual meaning to his life.

At the Berkeley Poetry Conference, in 1965, when he told Gary Snyder that he was going to Alaska to make money to start a bookstore in Berkeley, Gary told him to start his bookstore somewhere that could benefit from Jampa’s experiences. Ellensburg, Washington, in the geographical heart of the state, is where Jampa set up shop.

Jampa and Cheri founded Four Winds in 1978 with the help of Sid Thomas. The New Age Movement was starting to percolate. What for a while had been a small section of books in the store became the mainstay, during the 1980s. Books that were once considered esoteric now gained a popularity unheard of in the past. Works by members of the Order of the Golden Dawn, the theosophy of Madame Blavatsky (1831-91), and occult treatises of ancient philosophers were dusted off and reprinted in new editions. Contemporary works on astrology, tarot, crystal healing, alchemy, numerology, and psychic channeling appeared. The divinatory arts were in ascendancy. Mysticism, east and west, was now designated “metaphysics,” a term which had long been reserved for a branch of philosophy dealing with first principles, like the structure of the universe and the nature of being. Now, the meaning was stretched to include poltergeists and Babylonian musical modes. Jampa was not going to argue. The sale of these books paid the rent.

Chester Keller, the Chairman of the Philosophy Department at Central Washington University, became one of Jampa's best customers and a good friend. Chester made it possible for David Pond to get his master's degree in Experimental Metaphysics. It was an inter-disciplinary degree with the Psychology Department, and Roger Fouts, the well-known primatologist, was on the committee. Roger had an interest in eastern philosophies and the mystical arts. Jampa had many animated conversations with both Chester and Roger, as well as David, whose main interest was astrology and who went on to a successful career in this field.

David and his sister, Lucy, had a large manuscript on metaphysical techniques, a handbook on how to apply the disciplines of astrology, tarot, I Ching, numerology, and palmistry to your questions about life without needing prior experience in these branches of divination. A step-by-step book. Jampa edited the manuscript from over 400 pages to 180 pages and readied it for publication with fine illustrations by Jim Sorensen. In exchange for his valuable contribution, David gave Jampa a Texas Instruments contraption that printed out the exact degree and minute on the house cusps for the construction of astrological natal charts and spent considerable time showing Jampa how to interpret these charts. Jampa hung out a sign and made astrology and tarot readings a sideline to his business as a bookseller. Even after personal computers were being used to make charts, Jampa continued drawing his by hand. When asked why, he would reply, "A compass and a square alone were sufficient for God to create the World, and they'll do for me to make this chart for you."

Ed Sullivan, another Four Winds patron, overhearing Jampa in conversation with someone touch upon the involvement of the Masons in the revolutionary politics of the 18th century, asked if he would like a petition to join the local lodge. Jampa considered this and decided it would be a wise move on three counts. First, he was curious about the "secret knowledge" rumored to be held by the Masons; second, he felt it would be beneficial to him as a businessman to be connected socially with others in his community through a fraternal organization; and third, and most important, Jampa knew it would please his father and heal, or go some ways towards healing, the rift in their relationship. Jampa petitioned Ellensburg Lodge #39 of Free & Accepted Masons and was granted the right to enter as an "apprentice."

After his initiation as an Entered Apprentice, he took the Second Degree of a Fellowcraft Mason, and finally the Third Degree of a Master Mason, all this occurring in 1985 and 1986. Jampa attended meetings, participated in the work of the Lodge, and studied the lore. Then, he was asked to be an officer, and he took the Chair of the Junior Warden and, in the following year, the Chair of the Senior Warden. In 1990, Jampa Dorje (Richard Denner) was elected Worshipful Master of Ellensburg Lodge #39 of Freemasons. The Lodge was full on the day of his installation, friends and family members and his brethren and their families, all wishing him success. He received a telegram from his father that congratulated him on his accomplishment and told how it was a proud moment for his son to be so honored. Jampa felt jubilant.

Not being myself a Mason, I am ignorant of the secret rituals that are performed and of the esoteric knowledge that is imparted. Jampa informs me that there are severe penalties imposed on those that divulge what has been entrusted to them. What I have learned comes from Geddes MacGregor's Dictionary of Religion and Philosophy. I quote:

Generally speaking in the English-speaking world freemasonry usually conserves a distinctly religious character, although reflection both the Deism fashionable in the 18th c. and an esoteric tradition that tends to look upon all religions with favor yet as mere outward expressions of a common inward truth that is conserved in the "craft" of masonry.

A distinction needs to be made between "Speculative Masonry" and "Operative Masonry." The system of morality that is taught in Freemasonry derives its signs and symbols from the craft guilds of the stone masons of the Middle Ages. Certain signs, gestures and handshakes were kept secret so that members could recognize one another. Later, when the craft lodges began to decline, the lodges accepted members who had a purely historical interest in architecture and who introduced speculative ideas into the mix. The connection with the building of King Solomon's Temple derives from this phase in the evolution of Masonic tradition.

Various expressions in everyday usage, such as "on the level," a "square deal," and "a stand-up guy" may have their source in Masonic terms, being connected to the tools of the trade: the square, the level, and the plumb, although "a stand-up guy" is a phrase more associated with the Mafia. (A clandestine lodge of Masons did organize, but were prevented from carrying out, an overthrow of the Italian government in the 1970s.)

With Jampa being a Worshipful Master of a Masonic Lodge and a practicing astrologer and tarot reader, he began to have the reputation of being something of a Magus. Jampa developed a script based on a William Butler Yeats story about Red Hanarhan. This script was to become the video Red Hanarhan, which was aired on Ellensburg Community Television, starring Bruce McNaughty as Red, Beryl Reeves as the Most Beautiful Woman in the World, and Jampa as The Magus. It was cleverly staged and directed by Dan Herron using a vast array of old-time special effects and shot on locations in and around Ellensburg—The Last Chance Saloon, the ballroom above the Palace Café, and the abandoned train tunnel along Canyon Road on the way to Yakima. Kim Secunda played the part of Power; Carolyn Zick was Knowledge; and Jimmy Eisenberg, wearing black engineer boots and a diaphanous gown, was Pleasure. All the magic of this pagan folktale was captured.

Jampa's reputation spread further. His talents were also appreciated by a small coven of witches. One of these ladies, whose husband was the pastor of a local church and who will go unnamed, invited Jampa to rendezvous with her at midnight, and she led him to the altar where they blessed each other on hallowed ground in mystic union. As the altar was narrow, they entered intercourse with the Divine on the floor behind the pulpit. Hallelujah!

It seems at times that Jampa is on the road to perdition. Certainly, some thought so. Take Laurie. She was a young college co-ed, studying to be a grade schoolteacher, beautiful, a fundamentalist Christian with a bubbly personality, a naïf. Jampa was her "project." His name had probably come up in her youth group as someone who needed to be saved. Jampa has a sixth sense about such things. The Four Winds was thought by some to be a den of wickedness.

So, Laurie ventured to cross the threshold of this devil's den and to beard this "rascal," as she like to call him. They went for walks. They walked and walked and talked and talked. They drank cherry cokes at the Highway Grill and went to the Liberty Theater to see The Greatest Story Ever Told, starring Max von Sydow. Jampa likes biblical movies, has since he was a child. The Robe, Ben Hur (both the silent version and the remake), The Chalice, The Ten Commandments—maybe just sentimental eye candy to some critics, but Jampa likes the reverent tone. Even controversial films, like Scorses's Last Temptation of Christ and Mel Gibson's The Passion, Jampa gives "two thumbs up."

Laurie could tell that Jampa loved Jesus, but that he was not going to be "reborn" in her version of the Gospels. She had run out of arguments, and Jampa had not budged at all. Jampa could tell that Laurie was feeling defeated; he could also tell that she was falling in love with him; and this posed a problem. Jampa was not trying to undo her faith or convert her to his path. He made himself unavailable to her, and she soon got the News.

Perhaps, there is an odor of sulfur around the youthful Jampa. He may have been baptized by the Devil. What say you, Jampa?

JAMPA: I am a man of love and I hope a brave man. If I have a fault, it is Pride, which is the fault of most poets. I am a Prince of Secrets and not a Prince of Darkness, I hasten to add. As a young man, I followed my desires. I could have curbed them; I chose not to. My desires at present are of a different order, yet I am learning to let them self-liberate. It is a difficult path but not futile.

BOUVARD: Another interest of yours is the Kabalah. I know a little about it, too. The Divine Tetragram, which is a magical word, is formed by the union of the Emanated Phallus, Adam, the Yōd, and the 3-part name of Eve, which then forms the name of Jehova, the English equivalent of YAHWEH, a name not to be spoken aloud. (See The Great Work of Undo by Rabbi Fisk-chak Ben Ezra, All Bright Publications, Cairo, 1947.) If the names in the Tetragram are reversed and divided, when we read in verse 27 of the first chapter of Genesis how God in his own image "male and female created them," then God is a Hermaphrodite, IT or THEY.

JAPMPA: Stop! You are way in over your head. You will perpetuate the fallacy of projecting human characteristics on the generative principal and to further confound the issue with sexual valences, the male primacy of which is questionable. I have concluded that the Science of God is mainly a vast system of correspondences—a word is a number is a color is a tone is a mineral is a planet is a god—and that divinatory epistemology distorts knowledge, much like a planet distorts spacetime. If existence is based on interdependent relationships, fine and good; let us get on with living. The Buddha claims that if you train your mind and achieve enlightenment, everything else falls into place. This fall, I hope to take Dr. Coe's class on Women & Philosophy. It will probably touch on the concept of gender neutrality.

The problem for the development of aesthetic morality is the same one that Schiller envisioned, the problem being the rarity of detached observers observing a work of art. The same for meditation. The meditator finds the monkey mind, the chatter, the static without being able to see the background, the nature of mind, the absolute. Can't get any leverage. First of all, unable to think about thinking, let alone observe the process. Kant could. Fichte did. Schelling went a bit inward, and Hegel a lot further outward. Schiller posits "play" as a resolution of the mind-body dualism, finding an identity between thinking and feeling, suggesting thinking with the feelings, or at least attempting to understand conscience, will, the feelings in relationship to the thoughts, their interrelations, and distinguishing between the kinds of thoughts—list making, analytical calculations, imaginative ramblings, syllogistic sophistries, sexual fantasy—and being able to be still long enough without distraction, even if an ant bites you in the armpit. Everything shifts around. The mind wanders, processes another draft, another scenario, another strategy. Dissonance—distraction.

The Spectator sniffs it. Touches. A thinking Eye. Another eye sits behind this eye, a primal Eye. The Third Eye. Rigpa. The metaphysical basis for the ground of consciousness. The ground of the ground. The Base. That which, no matter how it is supposed to be, isn't and yet is rationally experienced as present awareness. Behind existence.

At one end of the spectrum I compare bigness with smallness white with black, male with female and accept the contradiction, their identity being a pointing to what cannot be conceptualized and only partially pointed at because one abstraction reduces to another abstraction until, in reaching beyond the a priori continuum to the-Thing-in-itself, that Schopenhauer calls the Will and Hegel the Geist, which Fichte feels in his Ego, and Schelling expects to find in Freedom, and Kierkegaard touches with his raw faith and Nietzsche experiences in madness. At the this end of the spectrum I go beyond common logic to an more fundamental logic in order to think with feelings. This requires intellectual intuition.

ATHENA

Athena, bright-eyed, chaste and circumspect
Goddess of art, wisdom, and the craft of war
Hot on the battlefield, hot between the sheets
If you can get her between the sheets

You blinded Tiresius but gave him second sight
If I were to choose to whom to give the golden apple
I'd choose you.
