Practicing a Royal Greeting

Older people are relatively marginalised within the involvement of service users in professional education. We sought to generate some learning materials for professionals about dementia using a co-productive approach. Comedy techniques were used to develop a bespoke programme for older people with dementia and their carers. Through comedy and film the project generated new insights to how we can work more effectively and optimistically with older people and their representatives in a creative and person centred way. The project built on older peoples knowledge and skills and helped them learn new ones

The Silver Comedy Team

How?

Four workshops were provided using an experiential and improvisatory process. Actors, students and directors only met for the first time at the workshops, which made the process very experiential and improvisatory.

Outcomes

A DVD s that can be used in the teaching and learning of professionals to stimulate discussion about the potential of people with dementia and to challenge stereotypes in a non-conventional way.

- worked in teams with older people, as equals
- were free to think about issues in a more creative way
- were able to use humour to explore topics
- drew on knowledge of the intimacy and sexuality of their own families
- were free to explore issues through characters
- used 'vox pop' to approach a wide range of people to get varied answers from different points of view on the subject
