REPORT: MARVIN E. TONG, JR., DIRECTOR,
MUSEUM OF THE GREAT LAKES

A Museum of the Great Lakes has been established in Bay City, Michigan, and will have as its mission the interpretation of man to his environment in the Great Lakes region.

Marvin E. Tong, Jr., formerly director of the Museum of the Great Plains and the Great Plains Historical Association in Oklahoma, has been named director of the new museum of the Great Lakes.

The new regional museum is located at 1700 Center Avenue in Bay City where it owns extensive property. The Museum will open to the public this Spring, and long-range plans are being formulated for the eventual construction of a specially designed new building to house the museum collections.

Tong points out that there is no current museum devoted to the environmental and ecological aspects of man's history and relationship to the Great Plains environment, yet the lakes themselves have had a more important impact on the history, cultural development and economic growth of North America than almost any other section of the country.

Besides developing interpretative exhibits on the history, environment and ecology of the Great Lakes, the new museum also plans the establishment of a Great Lakes information center, and research programs into the fields of pollution, history, economic development and environmental archaeology within the next year or so.

Museums devoted to interpretation within natural geographical regions are comparatively a new concept, and the Great Lakes is of prime importance in having such a museum devoted to its history, Tong explained.

Governed by a twenty-one man board of trustees of the Bay County Historical Society, the Museum of the Great Lakes is receiving financial support from the county, board of education, and membership dues and contributions.

The Museum of the Great Lakes has taken over the extensive historical collection of the Bay County Museum, including artifacts, manuscript and archival material, and library.

The new museum plans to establish cooperative relationships with the Great Lakes Basin Commission, Upper Great Lakes Regional Commission, International Association for Great Lakes Research, and the Great Lakes Foundation, and other groups working toward understanding of North America's inland seas, their history, economics and problems. "We want to get involved," Tong says, "with others on solving some of the knotty problems of man's relationship to the lakes, past, present, and future."

Henry G. Rexer, Bay City insurance executive, is president of the Museum of the Great Lakes.
