ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Three times weeping for three men, the universal pall of black cloth has been hung on the streets of Chicago—for Lincoln, Garfield, Grant. Once only has the city, for one man, flung forth the colors of the Union in every form, from every window, smiling like a May Queen. Then Grant, the conqueror, the citizen, the silent kindly man, rode past these regions gazing on seas of smiles, through tempests of welcome.

He was good to this city. He signed to it four millions for its post-office and millions for its harbors. He asked Congress to establish a mint here. And when the city burned, his was the strongest hand put forth. The laws were made to quickly hide the ruins of Chicago, and the sinews of the nation were lent to make us strong.

He died on Mount MacGregor, and Pemberton of Vicksburg stood at his bier and carried his pall. Then the heart of the American nation, bursting from its iron and golden bands, poured a great love over the sacred dead—on Grant, whose fierce and warlike soul had hurled awful armies into the abyss of death, that, by shattering homes, homes might cease to be broken, and that, returning over the bloodiest path in our history, he might bring the glad tidings of peace. While a million mourners went with Grant to his tomb, there coursed Chicago's streets, the self-same hour, a solemn and mighty panoply of the city's woe. The empty catafalque, the unmounted horse, the funeral march, the military tread—these went by, and Grief festooned her signals where Joy had welcomed the living soldier.

We meet this anniversary day that Grant was born, under the almost star-fretted canopy of a temple built by Ferdinand Peck, who played the games of childhood where the chief buildings of Chicago rise. We call to the praise of Grant an orator who rose out of our soil with the daisies and dandelions of the prairies so lately close at hand. Beside him sit two of the most renowned living soldiers of the North and South—Howard and Fitz-Hugh Lee, glorious assistants, guests, and orators. Thus honorably sustained, in Ferdinand Peck's house, for Chicago, Luther Laffin Mills, of Chicago, our orator, garlands Grant's great memory with the words of a city's reverence and affection.

GEN. O. O. HOWARD

UNDER TWO FLAGS.

Stars and bars, stripes and stars
Fluttering both together,
With an army blue in the skies o'erhead
And a gray in the growing heather.
Blue are the violets peeping out
From the spring's disordered tresses,
And gray are the clouds that drift about
'Neath the south wind's soft caresses.

Stripes and stars, stars and bars
Fluttering both together,
Where the wounded lay in the tangled grass
And the dead men slept in the heather.
We hear the boom of the heavy guns
And the musket's noisy rattle,
The shriek of bugles and snarl of drums
Blown back from the days of battle.

The scenery shifts, the battle lifts,
The battle's smoke blows over;
We hear the lowing of the cows
The bees among the clover.
The sleepy farm house now peeps out
Where robins woke in wonder,
To listen to the battle's rout
And hear the cannon's thunder.

Before us march the boys in gray
That crowned a Longstreet's glory,
And boys in blue turn out to-day
To tell a Howard's story.
No sound of battle mars the scene,
No blood is on the clover;
The grass once red is emerald green
And war's grim days are over.

Stars and bars, stripes and stars
Fluttering both together,
With an army blue in the skies o'erhead
And a gray in the growing heather.
Blue are the violets peeping out
Where Blue and Gray are meeting,
Gray are the clouds that drift about
And give twin heroes greeting.

LUTHER LAFLIN MILLS

GRANT—A REQUIEM.

Though Sierra's crags unfold me
Where to-night I sit alone ;
Though no human tongue hath told me,
Yet I know that he is gone.

For the winds that erst were sighing
In the swaying boughs o'erhead,
"He is dying! He is dying!"
Now are moaning, "He is dead!"

Till the clouds, symphonious roaring,
Clasp the shiv'ring mountain 'round,
Deep into the canyons pouring
Monodies of mournful sound.

Quick, recurrent fires go reeling
Through the sable skies and light
Earth's tumultuous breast, revealing
All the storm's majestic might.

And, behold! with aspect solemn,
High above, the god of war
Leading forth an endless column
Toward th' one unclouded star—

Soldier spirits long have slumbered,
Deaf to bugle, fife and drum,
Waiting in their graves unnumbered,
Waiting till the chief should come,

On they sweep, a line unbroken,
Through the sky with steady tread—
Though no human tongue hath spoken,
Thus I know that Grant is dead.

Charles Eugene Banks.

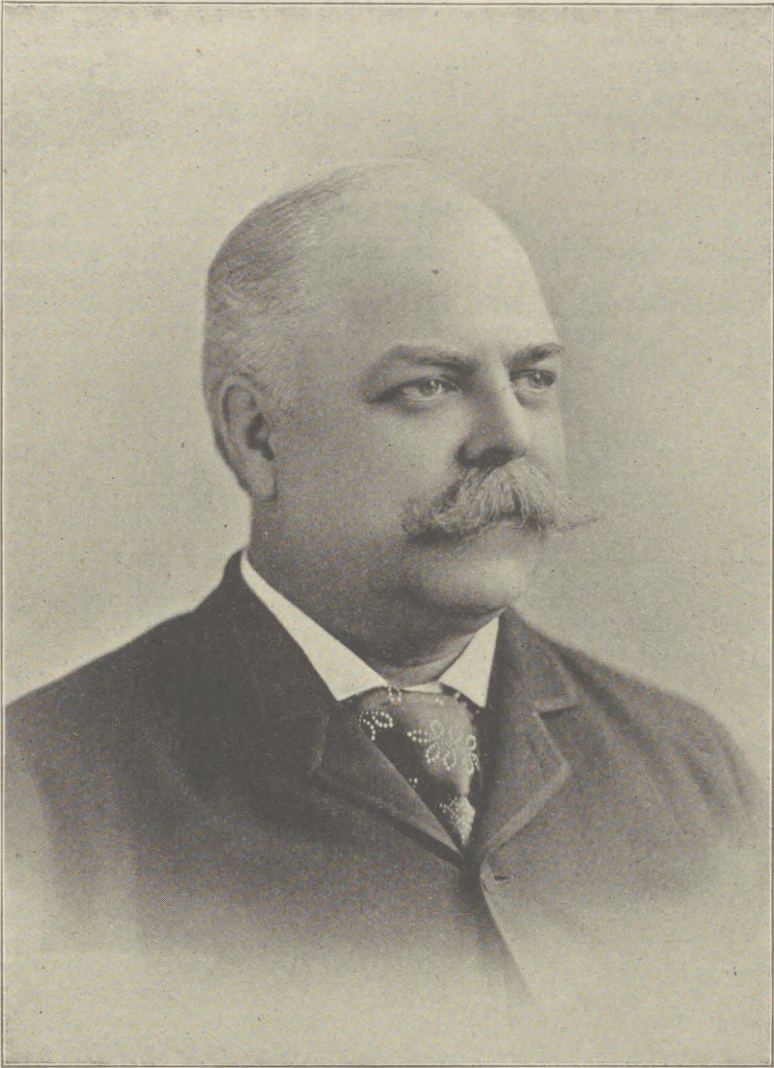

A commercial community expresses regret, society shows its sympathy, but the family circle feels a deep sorrow—and the Press Club was the family circle of James W. Scott. “I have known what a journalistic victory is,” said Franc B. Wilkie, whose life was slowly going out, “and I have met many genial and kind-hearted people, but I have found my friends in the Press Club of Chicago; and I want to lie there one night after I am dead.” And he lay there, covered with flowers, and his friends remembered his words, and tearfully looked upon him. Out from the Press Club men have gone, thrilled with the prospects of a great achievement, and during years of struggling with ambition, they have remained away; but when a sorrow fell upon them, they came back to climb the old stairs, to meet the old friends, unchanged, sympathetic.

And it is this fraternity, this sentimental brotherhood in the midst of a city's wild, commercial jungle, that mourns the death of James W. Scott. His interest in us was deep; hither he came to speak without restraint, to grasp a hand that felt not the itch of business. “I am working for you now,” said an old newspaper man in the Club, addressing Mr. Scott—“I am working for you now, and what shall I call you?”

“Call me Jim,” the journalist said, and he called him Jim.

Yes, how deep an interest he took in the affairs of the Club, how earnestly he strove to make our home—his home—a pleasant place of abode. He was our brother and we mourn his death.
