I actually created this for an old issue of Synapse! The article this was for was about the ILOVEYOU virus and human psychology, and I couldn't resist the urge to draw some brains. This design didn't make it to the final composition, but I still really enjoy the composition.

This was created during a summer internship in Konstanz, Germany where I spent 3 months working in a collective behavior lab. The “big picture” of my research was discerning how the startle response of a single insect could propagate through a swarm of thousands; it was hands-down some of the coolest

Unlike the Anchiornis piece, this illustration of a juvenile Parasaurolophus isn't based on a specific holotype—rather, it's a bit of speculation inspired by the book Locked in Time, which had a chapter about fossil evidence of death during river crossings which stuck with me for too long to not draw something related to it.
