DEAR READERS,

Home can play a large role in your life — especially when leaving home for college. The importance of choosing where to live and how to make that place a home is something all college students have to navigate. We hope our annual Housing Guide will help you navigate the housing world as you plan where to live next year. You are just pages away from tips on how to budget your money (page 14), seeing how well you know your roommate (page 12) or even planning a fun night in with your friends at home (page 18).

The housing options at WKU and in Bowling Green can be overwhelming, and Cherry Creative wants to be a resource for you. The Housing Guide is published during Housing week which consists of social media takeovers on the WKU Herald and Talisman accounts to help you learn about housing options. The highlight of the week is the Housing Fair on Wednesday, Feb. 23, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. in DSU. Local off-campus housing options and Housing and Residence Life will be together for a one-stop shop to answer housing questions, along with prizes and giveaways too. Still need a little more help? WKUapartments.com is another option for exploring housing options on and off campus.

Your home matters, and we are here to help.

REQUIRED HOUSING POLICY

All full-time undergraduate students are required to live on campus for two years, with five limited exceptions:

- Veterans of military service (181 days or more)
- If you are married or the primary caregiver for dependent children
- If you are 21 years of age or older before classes start
- Members of fraternities or sororities living in the chapter house (two semesters on campus and 30 credit hours earned)
- If you are commuting from your parent or guardian's permanent home (50 miles or less)

Even if a rental agent says you could get an exemption, do not believe them and sign a lease before talking to HRL.

LESSONS IN PLANT PARENTING

Story by Adelle Honeck | Photos by Alaina Webber

The responsibility of caring for another living thing can be a daunting task. With a list of do's and don'ts that is seemingly endless, buying a plant for the first time can become an intimidating experience, leaving many to feel discouraged. Fortunately, a green thumb is not something that one needs to be born with, but instead is a skill that anyone can acquire. Anybody with patience, and the desire to nurture, has it within them to become a plant parent.

When first looking into purchasing a houseplant, it is important to understand the basics of plant care. One of the most difficult aspects of caring for greenery is knowing when to water them. Depending on the houseplant of course, the amount of water needed will vary, but when figuring out what a specific plant needs there are key aspects to be taken into consideration. According to the New Garden Landscaping & Nursery website, a good tip is checking to see if the soil is dry and being aware of its root maturity.

Other important things to note when first bringing home a houseplant is the type of pot it is in and where in the living space it is placed, so that it gets the correct amount of sunlight for its species. On the New Garden Landscaping & Nursery website, it mentions that it is also necessary to assure a plant has proper hygiene, as one would for a pet, or even themselves.

Cleaning up plants can include cutting them so they will not become overgrown, and encourage new growth, as well as dusting them off occasionally and allowing their leaves to breathe. When purchasing a plant, it is also helpful to ask whomever is selling it for advice on what care it requires. Different plants have different needs, so making sure to ask for advice on what proper care is needed will help develop that green thumb.

Carleigh Riddle, Louisville senior, recently decided to reattempt caring for a houseplant after her first experience did not work out. To Riddle, the beauty of plants, as well as the simplicity of caring for them, is what aided her decision in purchasing one for the second time.

"I think they're really pretty, and I like to take care of something that's not a pet and is low maintenance," Riddle said. "I also like to see them grow."

Riddle purchased her houseplant, a Watermelon Peperomia, at the local Bowling Green shop, Jules With The Flowers. Because she had a habit of overwatering her first houseplant, Riddle asked for advice on how she could better care for her new green friend from an employee at the shop.

"She told me to test the soil before I water and honestly just forget about it every few days so I wouldn't overwater it," she said. "Also, learning about things to look for on plants to see if they're not doing well, like the color of their leaves."

Other tips that Riddle learned to care for her houseplant are to only slightly water it and avoid putting it in direct sunlight. Riddle believes that these tips will help her to not make the same mistakes as before and become a successful caretaker for her Watermelon Peperomia.

Another senior, Elissa Akers from Lawrenceburg has been caring for houseplants for six or seven years. What first interested her in getting houseplants of her own was an event held in her hometown at a local nursery.

"They were holding an event where you could buy a plant and get a free pot to go with it," Akers said. "I got a little cactus, and I got a mug to go with it."

As she got more accustomed to caring for houseplants, Akers added more to her collection and now has a wide variety of species.

"I have a Monstera, and I have a lot of Money Plants because they grow pretty quick, and you can propagate and replant those," Akers said. "I also have some sort of ivory plant I'm not sure the scientific name of."

Akers' personal favorite out of the houseplants she owns is the Monstera plant. She said she loves the unique way it grows and the speed it grows at. Because it grows so quickly, it can easily be propagated, allowing her to grow new plants from the original.

Akers also shared some tips on what she believes new plant buyers should consider before purchasing one of their own.

"I would look up to see, especially if you have any pets in the house, what plants may be toxic to them, as well as just general facts on how to water them, how to propagate them if you want to build your collection, and just tips on how to keep them alive," she said.

Although initially learning to take care of houseplants may be overwhelming, it can be extremely rewarding to nurture something and observe its growth. Caring for plants and developing a green thumb can be an opportunity to learn before taking on larger responsibilities in life. Adding some greenery to a home is not only a great way to make it feel cozier but also a great skill that anyone can learn.

Tessa was gifted a beautiful fern from her grandmother which has been alive for several years and continues to flourish along with her other plants.

Tessa chose to place a few of her plants by the window for ideal light. Although the window allows for cold air to get in, her plants are still thriving.

How well do you know your roommate?

Story by Adelle Honeck | Illustrations by Bailey Brush

Do you want to put your roommate's knowledge to the test? You might be joined at the hip or perhaps it feels like you live with a ghost. Whatever your relationship may be, this might help you to learn more about them. Take this quiz with them to find out how much you really know about each other!

START

When does your roommate wake up?

They're an early bird

They're a sleepy head

No clue

How do they listen to music?

Where do you see them the most?

Do you know where your roommate is from?

Out loud

With headphones or earbuds

In our room

Around campus

Of course!

I'm not sure

Do you know if your roommate has siblings?

Do you hang out together?

Do you know their major?

When do they go to sleep?

Yes

Not sure

All the time!

Not much

Yes

I never asked

They're a night owl/early bird

I don't know

You know them well.

Two Peas In a Pod: It seems as though you and your roommate are close friends! You likely have spent many nights together talking for hours when, before you know it, it's 3 a.m.! You get along swimmingly and have great conversations!

You know a decent amount about them.

A Pleasant Acquaintanceship: You might not be together all the time, but you've still been able to learn quite a bit about your roommate! You are a compatible pair who have their own lives outside of the dorm. This roommate match has found the perfect balance of respect for a peaceful living arrangement!

You don't know much about them.

Do You Actually Live Together?: Not everyone is close with their roommate, and that is OK! You might be a bit curious about them, but minding your own business is not bad at all. If you'd like to get to know them better, don't be shy!

The B word: 3 Tips to Budget Finances

College can be hard. Budgeting your money in college can be even harder. It is easy to get overwhelmed and second guess what to spend your money on and how to save. In order to combat the confusion and anxiety, here are a few tips to help be financially responsible.

1. CREATE A BUDGET PLAN

Zach Jones is the program manager for the Center for Financial Success on campus and aids students in their budgeting needs.

"The best time to budget is before you sign a lease or make a car purchase or anything major — but when you submit yourself contractually to these payments, you may see that you have less decision making power," Jones said.

Jones explained that your priorities are reflected in the housing you are looking for. If living in a place that has added accommodations but a more expensive rent is important to you, creating your budgeting plan should reflect that priority.

"An essential budget is one that is written down, most commonly an app you can track as you progress," Jones said. "If you track that money as it is going out, you have an idea of your spending at any point and time."

Jones said that budgeting gives every dollar you have a specific job which makes it easier to spend your money because you don't have to feel guilty afterward.

"Whether or not you budget, you're saying yes to certain things and no to others," Jones said.

Jones strongly recommended the Center for Financial Success, which offers free coaching sessions for students who are looking to start organizing their finances. One of the services they provide is setting up an online budget that is accessible for most students and easy to maintain.

After graduating from WKU in 2018, Zach Jones became the Program Manager for the WKU Center for Financial Success. "If you build your budget you can see what you desire and not the people around you," Jones said.

"We like Youneedabudget.com because you can get a year for free as a college student, and it's very affordable after that," Jones said. "We also help students set that up by linking their accounts and seeing the best budget plan."

There are also online resources such as bestcolleges.com that list out steps for students who are new to budgeting their expenses. Some tips listed include breaking down your income and setting aside extra money for an emergency fund.

2. SORT YOUR PRIORITIES

Kaysten Thomas is vice president of finance for Kappa Delta Sorority and is responsible for maintaining the budget of the chapter as well as addressing any financial concerns within the sorority.

"You need to recognize what's most important to you," Thomas said. "You know that your needs come first, but your wants are on different levels based on how badly you want it."

Thomas said that most people within the sorority will come to her wanting to make a plan on how to budget in order to find out what is best for them and the chapter.

"You've got to plan ahead," Thomas said. "As soon as I know how much the dues are going to be, I make it a priority and recognize it's a commitment I agreed to."

One of Jones' biggest pieces of advice was to take the time to create a priority list for yourself with goals as well as expenses. Rent is one of those expenses that can take a big chunk out of your account but is mandatory to pay and therefore should be a top priority.

"Most of the time, 'wants' will fall under goals, and it helps to give yourself a sense of priority of what you want to accomplish,"

Jones said. "When you're budgeting, you want to make sure you're allocating for the things you have to pay for before you get paid again."

3. SOMETIMES LESS IS MORE

"Realizing you can still have fun without spending money is huge," Thomas said. "It's all subjective to the individual person."

Thomas explained how she works a part-time, on-campus job 20 hours a week to help pay for her sorority dues and have leftover money for her other priorities.

"A social life both in and out of Greek life is important; you can spend time with your friends without spending money that isn't necessary," Thomas said.

Thomas also tipped that you can use your meal swipes on campus to go to dinner with friends or even all huddle up and hang out in someone's dorm room.

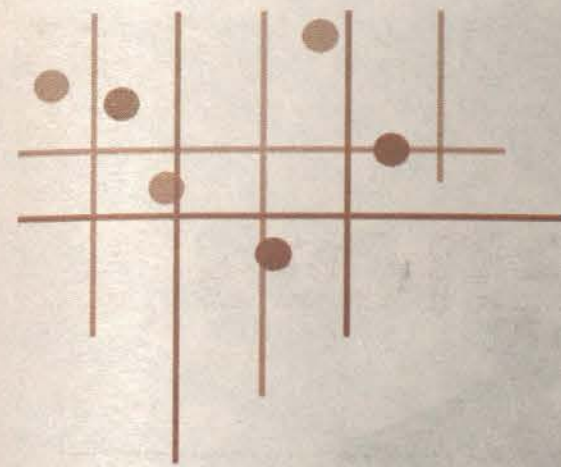

There's also a website, Best Colleges, that lists several different ways to decrease your spending while still making the most of your time in college, including: avoiding paying full price for textbooks, cooking for yourself, shopping at thrift stores and using student discounts.

"Building up your savings frees up money in other places," Jones said. "You can budget for fun — it's not restrictive, it's empowering!"

Learning how to budget and organize your expenses is the most manageable when you take it one step at a time. Don't let the B word scare you!

"Realizing you can still have fun without spending money is huge."

Katie Gibson, a freshman from Horse Cave, is majoring in biology and has a deep appreciation for design and organization. "I have a canvas over my desk, a little shelving unit by my door to put books on and throw pillows and blankets," Gibson said.

Get Your Space Together

TIPS FOR ORGANIZATION

Story by Téa Jones | Photos by Chloe Sharp

Gibson views her label maker as a necessity in order to make sure everything in her dorm room has a place. Gibson labels all her food baskets from cereal to sweets to bread and bagels.

Whether it is adjusting to dorm life or navigating life off campus, keeping your space organized can be overwhelming. It can be hard to even know where to begin but Lexington junior Wyatt Ingram, Hardinsburg freshman Cassidy McDaniel and Horse Cave freshman Katie Gibson have a few tricks for staying organized.

These three students were asked a series of questions and offered their personal tips for keeping their space organized. Ingram currently resides in a multi-roommate house off campus, while McDaniel resides in Pearce Ford Tower and Gibson in Minton Hall on campus.

Here are their responses, edited for length and clarity.

1. How did you make the transition from living at home to where you live now?

Ingram: I thought my room was a lot smaller than it was, so I thought I'd only need a bed, a chair and a dresser. When I moved in I had to buy so much more.

McDaniel: I had more space than I thought I was going to have so I had to buy more hangers and storage bins.

Gibson: I tried to make it as home-y as possible; I really like decorating and making it all look nice.

2. What are specific organization tips you have discovered?

Ingram: Be familiar with the space before you move into it. Do not buy a lot before you move in or anything that's not a basic need before you're settled into your space. My mom tried to give me a bunch of kitchen items, and I was really overwhelmed because I didn't know what I was going to need, and I had never lived in a space like this before.

McDaniel: I'll put different items in different storage bins such as socks in one and snacks in another. I also keep my stepstool under my bed and throw blankets in the cabinets so they're not visible.

Gibson: You can only do so much with cement walls and furniture that's all one color. I want to make sure everything has a space, and I try to use every inch of space I have. For example, I saw I had a gap between my closet and my desk about 8 inches so I found a rolling cart that fit there perfectly.

3. How do you keep your living space clean?

Ingram: Clean daily. Find a balance that you're comfortable living in every day and can wake up to and maintain so you're more productive. Because I pick up every day, it doesn't seem like a major task. Also remember if you're going to share a space with someone, it is equally theirs as it is yours. Be considerate!

McDaniel: I always make my bed before I go to class each day, and I wash my dishes right after I use them.

Gibson: I noticed it gets dusty, so I try to dust everything off. I also have a vacuum because having two girls in one space results in a lot of hair. I put all my snacks in little canisters, and I do my dishes a little bit at a time so it doesn't get too bad.

4. What is your biggest piece of advice?

Ingram: Make use of every square inch you're given. I have storage under my bed and stuff in drawers as well as night stands. Be creative with your storage. You can make it aesthetic!

McDaniel: The dorms aren't nearly as bad as people say! I enjoy living at the dorm — it's really not that bad. I don't mind the community bathroom because that means I don't have to clean it!

Gibson: What I found most helpful was raising my bed up to where there was a little gap between my dresser and the end of my bed. That's where I could put bins I found from Target. I could fit almost 10 bins under there! I also hang my shower caddy, keys and masks with command hooks. Use vertical space because there's not much floor. Go up because you can't go out!

Wyatt Ingram, a junior from Lexington, is majoring in interior design. "I chose interior design because it is so creative, fun and personal," Ingram said. "I like making people feel good and making spaces look beautiful, and it is so rewarding knowing you designed an environment that brings someone joy and peace."

THE PERFECT AT HOME

Game Night

Story by Gabby Wilson | Illustrations by Katie Ulrich

Picture this: It is a Friday evening, and classes for the week have finally come to an end, and the homework is either already done or a next day duty. Energies and spirits are high, and all everyone wants to do is get together and have a fun time.

But then there is the question on everyone's mind – what is there to do? There is the possibility of going out, but maybe the weather outside is gloomy and unsafe; spending money on an activity makes your bank account whimper, or going out just simply does not sound intriguing. Not a problem! Staying in can be just as fun – this would be the perfect chance to go head to head with your friends in an epic game night. Here are some perfect game night snacks and activities and why having this time with your friends is truly important.

Game night munchies

No matter what you are playing, you and your friends are bound to get hungry! Whether you have a sweet tooth or want something more salty or savory, there are plenty of food options to satisfy every player's craving. According to Outstanding Foods' website, there are plenty of snacks for a game night that are pretty mess free and always delicious. Some of the top recommendations were mini hard candies or mini chocolates, chips, pretzel bites, cookies, a charcuterie board, popcorn and fruit (just to name a few). You can personalize all of these options to satisfy anyone in the group, making the experience even more special and unique to whomever you are playing with. In between game strategy, these snacks are sure to be filling!

Competitive or not, these are the games to play

The night is falling into place – you have the people; you have the snacks. But what to actually play? With so many games to choose from, this can be a slight dilemma. Of course, this is a personal decision that can vary between people and game nights, but there are three fun games the Oprah Daily website highly recommends to have the perfect night in playing games with friends.

The first is Cards Against Humanity – this will surely have the whole gang laughing for hours. There truly is no limit to how many people can play. The card game itself has recommended 3-20+ players – the amount of players feels endless! This game has you trying to one-up the other players with comedy, coming up with outlandish answers to a prompt. The game can be quite out there and raunchy with its answers. It always is a hit game where anyone can be as creative as they want in hopes of winning!

Next up is Watch Ya' Mouth Original Mouthpiece Game – it is quick and entertaining and is usually played over and over again. It is part strategy and all comedy and also includes a lot of people to play, recommending 2-10+ players. The phrase "What'd you say?" will come out in between fits of laughter as someone tries to say funny sentences while wearing plastic cheek retractors. The others playing will try to guess what is being said, earning points for correct guesses. This game can be played for several rounds and always leaves the room full of laughter.

The last game suggestion is Ticket to Ride, which leans more toward strategy and critical thinking. Everyone can put their game faces on and let their skills fly. This game has a drastically smaller player count compared to the other suggestions, with the recommendation being two to five players, but it is just as fun and can call for a cozy game night experience. This game is a fantastic cross-country train adventure where the players must collect and play matching train cards to claim railway routes that connect through North American cities – the longer the routes, the better! No matter if you are more competitive or not, this game can lead to fun strategy and make the time fly.

Game nights will never go out of style

There is so much more to a game night with friends than just the food and the games. There are so many benefits to having a game night, according to the Help Guide website. Playing games with friends can improve your relationships with those you are playing with and strengthen connections. Being with those you love and care about and laughing and having fun can help to harness empathy, compassion, trust and intimacy with others. These game nights can also boost stamina, stimulate creativity and relieve stress. School can be overwhelming and stressful, and spending valuable time with your friends doing activities that stimulate closeness, fun and creativity can be the perfect end to a school week. Being with friends and doing something that everyone can be included in makes for a wonderful night in.

You can be with friends anywhere, but spending the time together playing fun, interactive games really checks all the boxes of fun, coziness, closeness and stress relief. With the right snacks and the right company, creating the perfect night in with a game night will leave everyone happy. The housing experience is more than just moving into a new place – it is about the memories you create there that you will never forget, the laughs and shared experiences with friends and roommates and the unique experience of being able to live on or near WKU's campus. You can go out another night – this time it is friend game night, and it surely will not disappoint.

Adventures In Dorm Living

Story by Abigail Wilkerson | Illustrations by Kayla Worden

Life on campus is an experience that can hold plenty of twists and turns, everyone having their own experiences and tales to tell; housing on campus can be filled with the unexpected. Most students can recall overflowing laundry rooms, nights in with your roommate, meeting new friends in the most unique situations and even encountering some cute critters. But not all run-ins with creatures and roommates in dorms have been great — some stories are downright horrific.

Mount Sterling sophomore Emily Sturgill spent her first year in Hugh Poland Hall, where she made her own on-campus housing memories. The memory that stuck out most was when two of her dorm neighbors had managed to smuggle in two hamsters, and rope her into their secret.

Sturgill became acquainted with the hamsters, Bill and Randall, when she befriended her neighbors, holding and playing with them. Her neighbors would often bring the hamsters into her room while they were hanging out. Little did she know that Bill and Randall were wanted by a Hugh Poland resident assistant.

Sturgill recalled the memory as being really funny. She and her neighbor were sitting on the bed while holding the hamsters when suddenly and unannounced, an RA came into the room in a frenzy, screaming "Show me the gerbils!" Sturgill and her neighbor hid the hamsters in their hands under the covers, keeping them free.

As much chaos as Bill and Randall had managed to bring into Sturgill's dorm room and life, they also brought her new friends. These same two neighbors are now her suitemates this year.

One experience like aiding in an on-campus housing crime can result in a long-term friendship.

While Sturgill was greeted with some of the cuter critters that have made their way onto campus, Anisa Bobzien, a junior from Louisville, had an experience that was not as enjoyable. During Bobzien's freshman year on campus at Douglas Keen Hall, she and her friends met their match in, of all places, the communal showers.

When that stall door closes and the shower curtain gets pulled back, the last thing expected is to see a cockroach crawling in the same area everyone bathes in, yet this is exactly what one of Bobzien's dorm neighbors was met with. The last thing one might guess is that the cockroach came from the other side of the building — bred to be a bearded dragon's meal.

Of course, the student bred the cockroaches in his dorm room with no original intent to infest his floor. However, once the student began breeding the cockroaches, they not only became his problem but a problem for the entire dorm building.

"The whole building was infested for a while — it was a mess," Bobzien said.

The cockroaches had crawled from the fourth floor of the male tower into the female tower as well. The cockroaches left no floor in Douglas Keen untouched, even making a home in the female showers on Bobzien's floor.

"I remember a cockroach going down the drain in the showers on my floor," Bobzien said. "It was so disgusting."

Several of the girls and her friends in the bathroom were screaming at the sight of a critter where they shower regularly. Between the chaos and the hisses of a cockroach at the end of its life as it circled the shower drain, Bobzien was filled with pure disgust, shocked at this turn of events.

Even with being a witness to the death of a cockroach, Bobzien is now more engaged and active in on-campus housing than ever as an RA and able to make more memories on campus. While it may have not been as cute as the illegal hamsters, an experience like the one Bobzien had is one that any college student would remember.

While unique critters can surely call for some interesting memories involved with life on campus, they are not always the culprit and main focal point of some students' oddest housing stories. Sometimes the most head spinning housing stories stem from roommate interactions and encounters.

St. Louis senior Haden Moore has had a few encounters with roommates that have been far from perfect. Rooming with strangers can be a unique and somewhat mysterious endeavor that can show how compatible or not some people are when it comes to sharing a room.

In 2021, Moore lived in Zacharias Hall, a suite style dorm, where he and his roommate shared a bathroom with two other people. Moore said his other two suitemates constantly occupied the bathroom, especially late at night.

"During the spring semester, I came back to my dorm late at around two in the morning. My roommate was at home for the weekend, but I overheard my other two suitemates in the bathroom and gave up trying to go in after 30 minutes and just went to bed," Moore said. "It took a bit for me to fall asleep with them constantly talking and making noise in the bathroom, but as soon as I did they burst out singing opera music, completely waking me up. It lasted about 10 minutes before they quieted down and then left the bathroom for the night."

Moore was over their shenanigans and ready to be roommate free. He remembered questioning his choice of coming to WKU, thinking he should have maybe gone to Missouri State, or at least somewhere he knew people so he didn't have to deal with the trouble.

He was determined to have his own private room the next semester, no matter the cost. While this incident was quite jarring, it did help Moore make a housing decision for the next school year.

"I feel like it made me realize how much of a difference a good RA can make, which is what made me consider being an RA in the first place," Moore said. "One, I get a private room, and, two, I can help resolve this issue for others."

It was the best of both worlds — privacy with his own room and a new role to take on to make sure the roommate and housing stories remained scarce. Moore is currently an RA in Gilbert Hall.

All of these students had unique and special dorm stories that made on-campus living a lively experience. These are memories that can only be made in the dorms on campus with other students, and the furry accomplices they bring with them.

Hamsters, bearded dragons, cockroaches and roommates are all key elements in having the full housing experience on campus.
