SMILE, HONEY— OR ELSE

If you've ever smiled sweetly when you felt like spitting nails, a new study may explain why. Francine M. Deutsch, Ph.D., assistant professor of psychology at Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley, Massachusetts, asked 20 male and 20 female college students to judge photographs of eight young men and women—some of whom were smiling and some of whom weren't. The results revealed a clear double standard: The poker-faced women were considered much less happy, less carefree and less relaxed than the unsmiling men.

Does this mean women must smile on demand—or be written off as uptight grouches? Not necessarily, says Barrie Thorne, Ph.D., professor of sociology at the University of Southern California at Los Angeles. "Smiling is an aspect of the feminine role that pleases men in particular," she acknowledges, "because it signals that a woman wants to reassure, appease or support." But in situations that don't reward traditional feminine behavior—business meetings, for example—she believes that cutting down on compulsive grinning may actually win you points. Her advice: "Go ahead and smile—but save it up until you have something to smile about."

Hey KA's! Guess what
Only 6 weeks of School left! Keep up
The studies!!!

Lots of Love & A.O.T.,
