Abstract

Purpose: The purpose of this paper examines the pattern of cultivation of agricultural land that is outside of the ownership of the land collector or the so-called absentee land. Research Methods: The method used is an empirical method, namely researchers directly search for data in the field by meeting with cultivators, absentee land collectors and community leaders. Then the data obtained is processed with an analytical descriptive method. And strengthened by legal materials in the form of legislation. Findings: The results of the study found that there were 2 (two) absentee soil cultivation patterns in Kintamani village, namely the cultivation pattern with production costs in agricultural land processing borne by all the cultivator and production costs in agricultural land processing borne partly by the landowner and partly borne by the cultivator of the land. The system of profit-sharing agreements between cultivators and absentee landowners in Kintamani Villaae is not written/oral based on a sense
