JASMINE HSUEH-TING LEE

we do this every morning. you roll out of your side of your bed somewhere around 7 and stumble to the bathroom. the mattress rocks a little when you rise. a cloud of steam wraps around you when you return (i dream of doing the same) and you come back to bed. your body is damp, heavy, and for some reason i reach for you.
you do not acknowledge my presence.

i carved your name into my right floating rib the first night i met you. my head is starting to sprout hairs the same color as yours. there are twin marks on my hips where your hands always rest. what else do i mean to you other than this side of the bed that's not even mine?

i know our routine by now. you climb back out of your bed, out of your room, into the kitchen wordlessly. all that remains of you with me is your scent, faint of sandalwood and beer. i close my eyes again, breathe in deep, and pretend that i am anything more to you.

you will remember i exist after your morning coffee. you'll come back in, hover over my body, hesitate, and simply just whisper good morning. then you'll leave. once again, i am no longer a person, but a crossed-off item on your to-do list. once again, i pretend that is what i want to be.
