ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The writers of this report desire to express their appreciation and obligation to the clay workers of the state who have so generously co-operated in the carrying forward of the work. In fact, anything like a satisfactory report would have been impossible without their assistance.

Most of the chemical work was done by Dr. J. B. Weems, Chemist of the Survey, and the chapter entitled "Chemistry of Clays" included in this report, dealing with the methods of rational and ultimate analyses, was prepared by Dr. Weems, and will undoubtedly prove to be a welcome contribution to chemists generally.

The laboratory work on the physical properties of clays was done by Mr. I. A. Williams, and the chapter on technology bearing upon these properties, and the descriptions of clay working machinery and processes were almost wholly prepared by him. Nearly all of the cuts illustrating the various types of clay working machinery were generously loaned by the manufacturers of the most approved types in the country, and to them due acknowledgment is made herewith.

The chapter on "Power Plants" prepared by Professor Bissell is timely and will undoubtedly be appreciated by all progressive clay workers.

It was the intention of the writers to include an elaborate report on clay testing but owing to the press of other work Professor Marston was unable to complete his work on the tests of paving brick. Fairly complete reports are submitted on common brick and dry press brick, and synopses on hollow block and paving brick.

In the preparation of the chapter on "The Geology of Clays" published articles and, in some instances, the unpublished notes of members of the Survey, to which the completeness of this chapter is largely due, were freely used and without special acknowledgment in the text.

The increasing scarcity of good lumber gives any treatise on structural materials, which may be used as substitutes for lumber, greater interest than it would otherwise deserve, and it is hoped that the present volume may be of service to contractors, builders and prospective as well as active clay workers.
