DEBRA ALLBERRY

All We Need

Purblind twilight, Michigan's mum in snow blankets and bird cloaks—grackles blackleafing two oaks and a locust, then taking flight in a swarm. The trees straighten into single digits.

House on the hill behind them, its arched windows lit. There were years I woke into cold, single rooms, and now.
Now we have all we need.

Even plenty has its ache. Two winters ago, another life inside me, I walked stubbornly centerless on the ice.
Now that child wakes to the dark dawn, looks out at the dim sparrows scavenging in the snow. No,

he calls it, no, no.
