

Masthead Logo

The Iowa Review

---

Volume 21
Issue 3 Fall

Article 23

---

1991

For the Nameless Girl in the Photograph

Frankie Paino

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

---

Recommended Citation

Paino, Frankie. "For the Nameless Girl in the Photograph." The Iowa Review 21.3 (1991): 146-148. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4063>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Two Poems · Frankie Paino

FOR THE NAMELESS GIRL IN THE PHOTOGRAPH

Here, under a sky littered with cries of gulls, Lake Erie redolent of algae, dead fish, is where I found you, nameless child, your photograph half-obscured by sand and a discarded paper cup.

All night I've tried to lose myself in the lap of tide, distant cars on the freeway—all those lives rushing around me on the way to a future where maybe someone waits, breathless, at the doorway, the aroma of bread rising like a glimmer of memory a second before any word is spoken.

But tonight, silence was all I wanted—more than anything, to think of nothing beyond this moment . . . not my father whose body, on x-ray, is luminous with cancer, or my mother with her thousand complaints looking suddenly old, her face wreathed in steam rising from her soup bowl last night.

And now you are here, insistent beneath my fingers, wanting, like anyone, to be held, acknowledged as someone valuable. My dark treasure. Your small frame appears more spirit than flesh, wrapped in the black envelope of underexposure which earned you this careless abandonment. The camera flash captured blue flame in your eyes like the final, desperate signal our planet might hurl across the galaxy.

Candy foils, winks of gold at your feet, suggest you posed, not amidst the trash of this stinking beach, but stardust. And though I'm certain the photographer meant only to save the day and you forever, he forced you into postures of adulthood, knowledge you can't yet possess, so that you stand, unnatural in your oval of light, the strap of your tattered bathing suit pushed off one shoulder so slight I can see the veins throbbing underneath, your right hand clamped over the spot on your waist which will, in years, assume a graceful, confident arc.

A woman's hand emerges from the corner of the frame, oddly predatory, as if she meant to rearrange you at the instant the camera flashed and whirred the already developing film out of its dark interior like a tongue which tastes something bittersweet.

How the bones of your hips protrude, like the backs of sleek fish cresting the water on their way to some destination I can only imagine. And your ribs, like skeletal hands, encircle, pull you toward a night some man will promise everything and probably leave you with the ghost of yourself, standing on this same beach, years from now but with the same haunted eyes. On your thigh is a bruise so much like a bird it becomes my wish for you, whoever you are—what I offer to the wind which wraps around my palm, opening, as if this poem, this prayer, might reach you in time.

ELEGY, 1822

This time it's not so easy, holding a pose, shoulders back as he bends to gather driftwood, build that final bed. All he can offer is this pyre—frankincense and salt which turn the flames chameleon. Shelley's dead.

And two years from Greece, the marsh disease which will kill him, Byron turns from the smoke, dusky medusa-curls circling his friend's face, the hand which held his own one summer in Geneva falling open as if offering something to the wind.

What else can he do but raise his head, that posture of defiance which makes the others envious,

Hunt and Trelawny ashamed of their own small love.
Byron's thinking he must leave before he thrusts his hand through the heat toward those lips, dark with their secret. He says he'll take the skull for a goblet, swallow death whole.

But now he will swim. Pushing away from shore,