Masthead Logo

The Iowa Review

Volume 32
Issue 3 Winter

Article 31

2002

Rendezvous at Auvers, 1873

Floyd Skloot

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Skloot, Floyd. "Rendezvous at Auvers, 1873." The Iowa Review 32.3 (2002): 112-112. Web. Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5608

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

FLOYD SKLOOT

Rendezvous at Auvers, 1873

Cezanne alone among the stone huts longs for light to hold still. He hears the river and wind within the chestnut trees as songs in discordant keys that come together with the rustle of distant wheat and all he wants to do now is curse high heaven. Color swirls before his eyes, thick, a brawl of values. He has wandered for seven hours waiting for Pissarro to arrive from Paris, soil blackening, air turning ocher, the landscape no longer alive along its sage folds. He has been learning green and gold, the use of blue, softer strokes like the caught breath of vision. But he needs Pissarro to calm him before rage chokes the last hope of brightness. Cezanne concedes nothing to the sudden cold front or shift in shadows, slathering paint in layers to approximate morning's sullen drift toward blue. Then, like an answer to his prayers, footsteps through the hillside grasses, the clink of wine bottles, a murmur of leather easel straps loosened and long sighs like zinc white skies the moment they are together.