

Masthead Logo

The Iowa Review

Volume 33
Issue 1 Spring

Article 46

2003

Some Roads in Iowa

Jill Osier

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Osier, Jill. "Some Roads in Iowa." The Iowa Review 33.1 (2003): 168-169. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.S718>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Some Roads in Iowa

He lived down the street, on a dead end known as Boulevard. A quiet boy I grew up drawn to, he grew lean, curving hard and away like a good pitch or trout.

We are never loving what we think we are. Never simply. The first thing we loved we don't even remember: a corner of fabric, some handle. When we loved again, perhaps a sound, we were actually trying to hear fabric. We listened for corners.

What toy, looking back, taught me wrong? It said to pull apart its hemispheres, let its insides tumble out. It said to fill the hollowness again, matching pieces to same-shaped holes. My many-eyed pumpkin. My few-starred sky.

Good reasons, beyond this, loomed for every shape, for North Fifth turning onto a boulevard, for the chance that we too would turn into something else—ourselves—or touch.

I was still a girl. I watched my left foot step into what would be a shape, saw hips then hands follow. I left sleep for concrete outside his basement bedroom window, sat at the screen for the sound of his breathing.

The hollow more than shape is certain, unfinished as some roads in Iowa —or childhood, where the sounds started, where we listened hard.