Special Issue on Midwestern History

On The Cover

Ashland University is a private, liberal arts and sciences institution preparing students for professions and careers. Ashland's rich heritage of preparing personnel for school dates back to 1878 when the institution was founded. The training of ministers and teachers was uppermost in the minds of the founders; and now, more than 100 years later, one of the two areas which were of primary concern has grown to become the School of Education and Related Professions.

Built on the model, "Teacher as Professional Educator," Ashland's teacher education program is based on current research, effective practice and collaborative relationships among Ashland faculty, Pre-K through grade 12 teachers, and administrators. The program offers a diversity of majors at both undergraduate and graduate levels and is accredited by the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education. The program emphasizes informing practice with theory and therefore is implemented through experiences in both university classes and supervised field placements.

Information for Contributors to the Mid-Western Educational Researcher

The Mid-Western Educational Researcher accepts research-based manuscripts that would appeal to a wide range of readers. All materials submitted for publication must conform to the language, style, and format of the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association, 4th ed., 1994 (available from Order Department, American Psychological Association, P.O. Box 2710, Hyattsville, MD 20784).

Three copies of the manuscript should be submitted typed double-spaced (including quotations and references) on 8 1/2 x 11 paper. Only words to be italicized should be underlined. Abbreviations and acronyms should be spelled out when first mentioned. Pages should be numbered consecutively, beginning with the page after the title page. Manuscripts should be less than 20 pages long. An abstract of less than 100 words should accompany the manuscript.

The manuscript will receive blind review from at least two professionals with expertise in the area of the manuscript. The author's name, affiliation, etc., should appear on the title page only. Efforts will be made to keep the review process to less than two months. The editors reserve the right to make minor changes in order to produce a concise and clear article. The authors will be consulted if any major changes are necessary.

Manuscripts should be sent with a cover letter to:
