Habits

by Katie Johnson

I think of you every time
I add coffee creamer and a scoop of sugar to my hot chocolate, or when I save the brown M&M's for last so they'll feel like "the most delicious."

I think of you when I click my tongue or crack my knuckles or watch "I Love Lucy" at 2AM when I can't sleep. I think of you when I fold my socks "the right way." It ended like it started. fizzling out like it fizzled in, a smoke bomb rather than a firework, longer lasting and less memorable than a brilliant flash. I did not grieve. There were no photos to save or destroy, no sweet messages on an answering machine to replay. I do not remember the smell of you or the sound of your voice. Your face would be blurry if I tried to conjure it. You left me no relics, no heartache. no memories: just a collection of habits, lackluster, not even annoying, a black burn fading to gray on a sidewalk.