

Public Abstract

First Name: John

Middle Name: David

Last Name: Shannon

Earned Degree: MA

Academic Program: Religious Studies

Adviser's First Name: Steve

Adviser's Last Name: Friesen

Co-Adviser's First Name: Patrisha

Co-Adviser's Last Name: Beckman

Graduation Term: Fall

Graduation Year: 2006

Title: "FOR GOOD WORK DO THEY WISH TO KILL HIM?": NARRATIVE CRITIQUE OF THE ACTS OF PILATE

Although previous generations of scholars have considered the Acts of Pilate among other passion narratives from the early Christian writings vilifying ethnic Jews for the trial and death of Jesus, my thesis demonstrates that this text is more complex and more nuanced than previously recognized by scholars. Although this text is suggestive of a literary trend popular among Christian writers slandering Jews for the crucifixion of Jesus, it is distinctive in this tradition because this narrative offers the high priests, the antagonist held accountable for the death of Jesus in other literary sources, as the narrative's main characters.

Furthermore, the narrative's plot is to convince this protagonist of the miracles and ascension of Jesus, and the narrative's conflict is the high priests' resistance and inability to refute these testimonials. This evidence is offered by characters of indisputable integrity, which are also Jewish. Through actors such as Nicodemus, three teachers from the Galilee, a council member named Levi, and even the miracle of Joseph's disappearance from his imprisonment, the narrative's protagonists remain unmoved regardless of the seemingly undeniable evidence. Finally, the choice of these figures as the narrative's obstinate protagonist in light of testimonials from Jewish characters suggests a possible social situation related to the composition of this form of the text and may add to the numerous arguments that have sought a definitive date for the origin of this text.