Public Abstract First Name:Thomas

Middle Name:Jose

Last Name:Josephsohn

Department:Sociology

Adviser's First Name:Mary Jo Adviser's Last Name:Neitz Co-Adviser's First Name: Co-Adviser's Last Name: Graduation Term:WS 2007

Degree:MA

Title:Branding Faith: Object and Consumerism in Religious Identity Construction

In this thesis I theorize about the potentially negative affects of competition among Evangelical groups in their attempts to attain members on a college campus. I hypothesize that in order to draw the attention of potential members, religious groups will offer "quick-fix" solutions to problems of everyday life which, due to their unsatisfactory nature, will result in either church-hoping or constant changes in religious identity. To observe these processes and investigate an understudied aspect of religious life, I look for how objects come to be a part of, or resist, tendencies towards church-hoping and simplistic short-term solutions. Contrary to my expectations, I found through photo-elicitation interviews and non-participant observation of one Evangelical group that members of the religious group I studied created long-term solutions, community, and a sense of wholeness in their lives through objects.