San Jose State University

SJSU ScholarWorks

Faculty Publications

Health Science and Recreation

1-1-2012

Reintegration of young mothers: young mothers seeking reintegration after periods of time spent living with fighting forces and armed groups face exclusion and stigma rather than the support they and their children badly need.

Miranda E. Worthen San Jose State University, miranda.worthen@sjsu.edu

Susan McKay University of Wyoming

Angela Veale University College Cork

Mike Wessells Columbia University

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.sjsu.edu/healthsci_rec_pub

Part of the Medicine and Health Sciences Commons

Recommended Citation

Miranda E. Worthen, Susan McKay, Angela Veale, and Mike Wessells. "Reintegration of young mothers: young mothers seeking reintegration after periods of time spent living with fighting forces and armed groups face exclusion and stigma rather than the support they and their children badly need." Forced Migration Review (2012): 25-26.

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Health Science and Recreation at SJSU ScholarWorks. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of SJSU ScholarWorks. For more information, please contact scholarworks@sjsu.edu.

Forced Migration Review

(FMR) provides a forum for the regular exchange of practical experience, information and ideas between researchers, refugees and internally displaced people, and those who work with them. It is published in English, Arabic, Spanish and French by the Refugee Studies Centre of the Oxford Department of International Development, University of Oxford.

Staff

Marion Couldrey &
Maurice Herson (Editors)
Kelly Pitt (Funding & Promotion Assistant)
Sharon Ellis (Assistant)

Forced Migration Review

Refugee Studies Centre Oxford Department of International Development, University of Oxford, 3 Mansfield Road, Oxford OX1 3TB, UK

Email: fmr@qeh.ox.ac.uk

Skype: fmreview

Tel: +44 (0)1865 281700 Fax: +44 (0)1865 281730

www.fmreview.org

Disclaimer

Opinions in FMR do not necessarily reflect the views of the Editors, the Refugee Studies Centre or the University of Oxford.

Copyright

Any FMR print or online material may be freely reproduced, provided that acknowledgement is given to 'Forced Migration Review www.fmreview.org'.

ISSN 1460-9819

Designed by

Art24 www.art-24.co.uk

Printed by

Fine Print (Services) Ltd www.fineprint.co.uk

FMR 40: In this issue...

2 From the editors

Being young and out of place

- 4 Putting adolescents and youth at the centre Sarah Maguire
- 5 Unable to see the future: refugee youth in Malawi speak out

Lauren Healy

6 Not inheriting the past

Yara Romariz Maasri

7 Marrying on credit: the burden of bridewealth on refugee youth

Katarzyna Grabska

9 Participation of adolescents in protection: dividends for all

Anna Skeels and Monika Sandvik-Nylund

Young and separated from their families in eastern Congo

Gloria Lihemo

- 12 From rural Colombia to urban alienation Alejandro Valencia Arias
- 13 Challenging some assumptions about 'refugee youth'

Christina Clark-Kazak

- 15 What it means to be young and displaced Tamara Velásquez
- 16 Being young and of mixed ethnicity in Rwanda Giorgia Doná
- 18 Intangible pressures in Jammu and Kashmir
 Ankur Datta
- 19 New political subjects: children of displaced Kurds Yesim Yaprak Yildiz
- 20 Choosing the street during crisis

Bridget Steffen with Zephania Owino

21 Adolescent sexual and reproductive health in humanitarian settings

Brad Kerner, Seema Manohar, Cécile Mazzacurati and Mihoko Tanabe

23 Young Costa Ricans and refugees working together for integration

Valentina Duque Echeverri

24 Helping young refugees avoid exploitative living arrangements

Martin Anderson and Claire Beston

25 Reintegration of young mothers

Miranda Worthen, Susan McKay, Angela Veale and Mike Wessells

27 Cultural reflections of Afghan youth living in Canada

Al-Rahim Moosa

- 27 Displaced girls' participation in local youth life Niklas Stoerup Agerup
- 28 Early experiences of young Sudanese resettled to Finland

Saija Niemi

- 30 Young people and relations of powerTrupti Magecha, Shamser Sinha and Alex Sutton
- 31 Assisting unaccompanied youth to integrate Nathalie Lummert
- 32 Supporting the social integration of trafficked young people

Claire Cody

32 The role of culture in mentoring

Bernadette Ludwig

33 Mentoring for resettled youth

Lauren Markham

General articles

- 34 Unlocking protracted displacement Roger Zetter and Katy Long
- 37 KANERE: a refugee-run free press in Kenya Editorial Staff of the Kakuma News Reflector
- 38 'Tolerated stay': what protection does it give? Inês Máximo Pestana
- 40 Afghanistan consults on an IDP policy Nina Schrepfer and Dan Tyler
- 44 Nigeria needs to take responsibility for its IDPs Bagoni Alhaji Bukar
- 45 Mental health in Palestinian camps in Lebanon Fabio Forgione
- 47 Psychosocial resilience among resettled Bhutanese refugees in the US

Liana Chase

48 Argentina: resettling refugees within the context of an open migration policy

Paulo Cavaleri

50 Statelessness and issue (non-)emergence Lindsey Kingston

51 Refugee Studies Centre news

52 Safe spaces for adolescent girls in Haiti

Haiti Adolescent Girls Network

New FMR website www.fmreview.org

As mentioned opposite, we have recently re-launched the FMR website. You'll find some new features:

- all four languages English, French, Spanish and Arabic – now on one site
- optimised for reading on mobile devices
- wide range of 'sharing' options
- background pages on our policies on photos, accountability and copyright
- information about our budgets and funding, and how to donate online to FMR font size and background options for those with visual disabilities

As before, you can read back issues of FMR online in various formats, request print issues of FMR or FMR Listing, and sign up for email alerts.

We hope we have improved the accessibility and usefulness of the site for you. Please visit the new site (remember to refresh your browser) and let us know if it meets your needs. You can either use the feedback form at www.fmreview.org/feedback or email us at fmr@qeh.ox.ac.uk themselves, it is critical that agencies working in the communities where refugees are living proactively seek to identify those at risk and refer them to UNHCR.

UNHCR and partner agencies should take advantage of the several opportunities they have to monitor a young refugee's situation, starting at the point of registration and typically proceeding through Refugee Status Determination interviews and several subsequent protection interventions. It is especially important that unaccompanied minors are identified as early as possible in the process so that Best Interests Determinations² can be conducted to identify the most appropriate interventions for them and help them access the services they need to survive. These early interactions with newly arrived refugees should be seen as opportunities to identify individuals with particular vulnerabilities before those vulnerabilities are allowed to become chronic, permanently undermining refugees' chances for stabilising their lives.

Claire Beston was previously a researcher at RefugePoint and Martin Anderson anderson@refugepoint.org is Operations Officer at RefugePoint www.refugepoint.org

Mei Lian Tjia, Gabriel Gill-Austern, and Manal Stulgaitis also contributed to a longer report covering these and other challenges faced by young refugees in Nairobi. For a copy of the report, please contact Martin Anderson.

- 1. All names have been changed.
- 2. www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/48480c342.html

Reintegration of young mothers

Miranda Worthen, Susan McKay, Angela Veale and Mike Wessells

Young mothers seeking reintegration after periods of time spent living with fighting forces and armed groups face exclusion and stigma rather than the support they and their children badly need.

In Liberia, Sierra Leone and northern Uganda, young women's lives were greatly disrupted by civil war. Part of this disruption was a fracturing in traditionally supportive relationships with family members, elders and peers. This article describes the findings of a three-year community-based participatory action research (PAR) study undertaken in 2006-09 with young women who are mothers in these three countries. Two-thirds of the 658 participants were formerly associated with fighting forces or armed groups, while a third were identified by community members as highly vulnerable for a variety of reasons including being orphaned or disabled. The study also included over 1,200 children of these young mothers.

The purpose of the study – which took place in 20 communities ranging from remote villages to urban centres – was to learn what 'reintegration' meant to these young women. Girls and young women who were formerly associated with fighting forces or armed groups and who had become pregnant or had children during armed conflict have been excluded from the disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration programmes developed by the international community. This exclusion is for numerous reasons, including gender discrimination and a perception that girls and young women are not a threat to the durability of peace accords and can thus be ignored.

When formerly recruited young women and girls settle in communities after war, they experience significant psychosocial distress and social isolation, which create a barrier to their reintegration. Many, in particular those who became pregnant or had children during the conflict, feel invisible and disempowered. As pregnancies are often a result of rape or forced marriage with male combatants, these young mothers and their children face additional stigma.

Although programmes are beginning to be developed to work with young mothers, most reintegration or skills training programmes – developed from adultcentric perspectives – have been unable to reach them and their children. The motivation for the PAR study was to learn from young mothers themselves what reintegration meant to them and how they could successfully achieve it for themselves and their children.

Developing relationships

After several months of community consultation and recruitment, the participating young mothers began meeting regularly in groups and researching the common challenges that they faced in their communities. They used a variety of methods to do this, including interviewing each other and their children about what their lives were like and how they felt different from other young mothers and children; talking with community leaders about how they observed the young mothers getting on and how life was different before the conflict; and role-playing about their experiences. The young mothers then discussed what they had discovered, set objectives for how they wanted their lives to change, and brainstormed ways and actions to achieve these improvements.

In most communities, the first actions were targeted at reducing stigma and marginalisation, and typically took the form of dramas or songs that the young mothers developed to teach their families and communities about their experiences, including their time with armed groups and what it was like to return. Through performing these dramas and songs, participants often won the support of formerly unsupportive community members and families. Subsequent actions were primarily livelihood support and education activities, such as learning how to care better for their children or about good hygiene and sanitation.

The backbone of the PAR project was the multiple relationships that participants developed with each other, with community members, with their families, and with agency and project staff. Nearly all the participants had lost family during the conflicts. While most young mothers had returned to their original communities, 35% of Liberians, 44% of Sierra Leoneans and 21% of Ugandans reported not being from the community they were currently living in. Only a third were living with a parent or guardian, while 41% were living with boyfriends or husbands; 5% were living alone with their children and the remaining participants lived with extended family members or friends. The relationships between the young mothers and their parents were often fraught and many participants reported feeling that their parents did not care for them well or that their parents mistreated their children. Relationships with boyfriends and husbands were also a challenge with more than half of participants reporting that their boyfriends or husbands were unsupportive of their children. In some instances, male partners were unable to provide economically for their children or were abusing alcohol and unable to act responsibly. In other instances, male partners were not the fathers of the young mothers' children and claimed no responsibility for them.

"Now people are caring for us"

When the project began, many participants reported that they sat alone all day and had no friends and only limited livelihood options, such as collecting firewood or doing farmwork on other people's land. Marginalised and lonely, they were made to feel ashamed. Yet even the simple act of bringing the participants together in groups and encouraging them to share their stories with each other brought much hope as participants began to realise they were not alone in their suffering. "I thought that I was the only one that was hated."

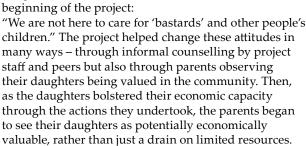

For some participants, the project created a shift in their awareness of themselves as worthy of love and support. One young woman put it this way: "We have never seen a project which cares for girl mothers... now we know that people are caring for us." The relationships between the participants grew over the three years of the project. "Our meetings have created a sense of oneness among each other and now we share our burdens. We are each other's sisters." As participants grew closer, they would often meet outside of regular meeting times. Reflecting on how the project developed, one young mother recalled, "Sometimes the ... group would cook together, eat together, and it helped us be one, and even helped us solve problems."

Community members were selected to form Community Advisory Committees (CAC) to support and advise the participants. CAC members were role models and mentors to the participants, and also rallied support from other community members. For example, in one community in Liberia, CAC members persuaded village authorities to donate land to participants to cultivate, found day-care centres and schools that were willing to give scholarships to the children of participants, and organised a baking workshop when participants decided to open a bakery.

Relationships with family members also improved during the course of the project. By the end of the project, more than 86% of the participants reported that they and their children felt more liked or loved by their families.

In some cases this was because of informal family counselling; for others, the improved relationships with their families went hand-inhand with their improved ability to contribute to the family. "Since I joined the group, my dish ration has improved. Before the food we received was small. Now I can contribute to household food, so it is different." Nearly threequarters of participants reported that since the project began they had become able to contribute to their families by buying basic necessities.

One parent had described her difficulty in supporting her daughter and her daughter's children at the beginning of the project:

Whereas in many cases family relationships had previously been sources of pain for participants, as the participants gained a sense of self-worth through their activities, economic livelihood development, and new relationships with peers and community members, family relationships greatly improved. The changes that the participants were able to achieve in their lives and the lives of their children are likely to be supported by the new, more caring relationships that surround them in their communities.

Miranda Worthen mworthen@post.harvard.edu is an Assistant Professor in the Department of Health Science at San Jose State University. Susan McKay McKay@uwyo. edu is A & S Distinguished Professor Emeritus, University of Wyoming. Angela Veale a.veale@ucc.ie is a lecturer at the School of Applied Psychology, University College Cork. Mike Wessells mikewessells@gmail.com is Professor of Clinical Population and Family Health in the Program on Forced Migration and Health, Columbia University.

1. More information about the study, including the participatory action methodology, is at www.pargirlmothers.com See also S McKay et al, 'Building Meaningful Participation in Reintegration Among War-Affected Young Mothers in Liberia, Sierra Leone and Northern Uganda', Intervention, 2011, vol 9, no 2, pp108–24 http://tinyurl.com/Intervention-pargirlmothers Funding for this study was provided by Oak and ProVictimis Foundations, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Compton Foundation and UNICEF West Africa. Agency partners in the PAR are: (in Liberia) Save the Children UK in Liberia, Touching Humanity in Need of Kindness (THINK); (in Sierra Leone) ChildFund, Christian Brothers, Council of Churches in Sierra Leone, National Network for Psychosocial Care; (in Uganda) Carritas – Gulu Archdiocese, Concerned Parents Association, Transcultural Psychosocial Organisation, World Vision.

