Boston College Law Review

Volume 34 Article 4 Issue 5 Number 5

9-1-1993

Begging and the Public Forum Doctrine in the First Amendment

John T. Haggerty

Follow this and additional works at: http://lawdigitalcommons.bc.edu/bclr

Part of the First Amendment Commons

Recommended Citation

John T. Haggerty, Begging and the Public Forum Doctrine in the First Amendment, 34 B.C.L. Rev. 1121 (1993), http://lawdigitalcommons.bc.edu/bclr/vol34/iss5/4

This Notes is brought to you for free and open access by the Law Journals at Digital Commons @ Boston College Law School. It has been accepted for inclusion in Boston College Law Review by an authorized administrator of Digital Commons @ Boston College Law School. For more information, please contact nick.szydlowski@bc.edu.

BEGGING AND THE PUBLIC FORUM DOCTRINE IN THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Begging, in its various forms, from the passive extension of a paper cup, to more aggressive tactics, has become an inseparable component of the modern urban landscape.¹ Each beggar represents a unique path into poverty, but they all seek alms for the same reason, survival.² Although impossible to estimate with certainty, a general consensus exists that the homeless population has increased in recent times.³

Many urban residents' and commuters' daily contact with beggars reinforces these estimates.⁴ As homelessness has apparently reached critical mass, so has the public's frustration with begging.⁵ Panhandlers are viewed as another manifestation of the deterioration afflicting American cities,⁶ and beggars consequently experience backlash from the mainstream, as attempts to salvage the inner cities have intensified.⁷ Thus, beggars on the fringes of society ironically now find themselves amidst the central paradox of our day, the conflict between individual liberty and the power of the majority.⁸

Recently, beggars have begun to use the First Amendment to challenge the government's attempts to prohibit begging. In 1990, in

¹ See Tony Perry, No Alms for the 'Panhasslers,' L.A. Times, Jan. 12, 1993, at A3 ("[e]ven the police grudgingly accept panhandling as part of the cityscape").

² See Perry, supra note 1, at A3. But see Dan Williams, Phony Homeless People Panhandle for Money (CNN News television broadcast, Jan. 14, 1993) (police allege scam artists pose as homeless beggars to get money from public).

⁸ See Laura D. Waxman, The United States Conference of Mayors, a Status Report on Hunger and Homelessness in America's Cities: 1991, at 25 (1991).

⁴ See Paul G. Chevigny, Begging and the First Amendment: Young v. New York City Transit Authority, 57 Brook. L. Rev. 525, 528 (1991); Sonya Rose, Street View: Daily Walks Sharpen Sense of Disparity, Chi. Trib., July 12, 1992, at 8.

⁵ See Waxman, supra note 3, at 59-62; Perry, supra note 1, at A3; J.L. Pimsleur, Police Commission OKs Anti-Panhandling Rules, S.F. Chron., Jan. 7, 1993, at A20 (voters approve anti-begging ordinance claiming that beggars are "trashing" the city).

⁶ See John Leo, Fighting For Our Public Spaces, U.S. News & World Rep., Feb. 3, 1992, at 18 [hereinafter Fighting]; John Leo, Rightsmongering and Urban Decay, U.S. News & World Rep., Dec. 14, 1992, at 23 [hereinafter Rightsmongering]; James Q. Wilson & George L. Kelling, Broken Windows, The Atlantic Monthly, Mar. 1982, at 29, 34.

⁷ Williams, supra note 2 (notes crackdown to get beggars off the streets for the public's sake).

⁸ See JOHN STUART MILL, ON LIBERTY, 1 (Elizabeth Rapaport ed., 1978); see also Williams, supra note 2 (classic battle between safety of masses and rights of few).

 ⁹ See Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 903 F.2d 146, 147 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S.
 984 (1990); Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, 802 F. Supp. 1029, 1031 (S.D.N.Y. 1992); Blair v. Shanahan, 775 F. Supp. 1315, 1317 (N.D. Cal. 1991); see also Jordana Hart, Street Begging Focus

Young v. New York City Transit Authority, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit upheld an ordinance banning begging in the New York subway system.¹⁰ In 1991, however, in Blair v. Shanahan, the United States District Court for the Northern District of California declined to follow Young and held a California prohibition on begging unconstitutional.¹¹ One year later, in Loper v. New York City Police Department, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York also sidestepped Young and invalidated a New York ordinance banning begging on the city streets.¹² Thus, beggars' First Amendment challenges have yielded inconsistent results.¹³

A 1992 United States Supreme Court decision, International Society of Krishna Consciousness v. Lee ("ISKCON") may foreshadow the approach courts will take to reconcile the seemingly inconsistent treatment of begging. ¹⁴ In ISKCON, the Court struck down a ban on the distribution of literature while upholding a ban on charitable solicitation in New York area airports. ¹⁵ Despite generating five separate opinions, all the Justices grounded their reasoning in the Public Forum doctrine, linking the degree of scrutiny accorded speech restrictions to a classification of its context. ¹⁶

This Note argues that begging generally should be protected because it constitutes "speech" within the meaning of the First Amendment, and regulations banning begging should be analyzed under the Public Forum doctrine analysis.¹⁷ Section I discusses First Amendment jurisprudence, focusing on three aspects: what is meant by "speech;" the degree of scrutiny to which regulations are subjected; and the values underlying the First Amendment.¹⁸ Section II traces the treatment of charitable solicitation in the United States Supreme Court under the First Amendment.¹⁹ Section III explores the history of beg-of Lawsuit; ACLU Challenges Cambridge Arrests, Boston Globe, July 26, 1993, at 13; CLUM Challenges Arrests for Begging, The Docket, Sept. 1992, at 1.

^{10 903} F.2d at 164.

^{11 775} F. Supp. at 1323, 1329.

^{12 802} F. Supp. at 1036, 1048.

¹⁸ See Anthony J. Rose, Note, The Beggar's Free Speech Claim, 65 Ind. L. Rev. 191, 193 (1989).

¹⁴ See 112 S. Ct. 2701, 2705–06 (1992) [hereinafter ISKCON I]; Lee v. International Soc'y of Krishna Consciousness, 112 S. Ct. 2709, 2710 (1992) [hereinafter ISKCON II]; International Soc'y of Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 112 S. Ct. 2711, 2712, 2716, 2724 (1992) [hereinafter ISKCON III]. This note will refer to the opinions collectively as "ISKCON."

¹⁵ ISKCON II, 112 S. Ct. at 2710; ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2709.

¹⁶ See ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2705-06; ISKCON II, 112 S. Ct. at 2710; ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2712 (O'Connor, J., concurring); Id. at 2716 (Kennedy, J., concurring); Id. at 2724 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

¹⁷ See infra notes 399-411 and accompanying text.

¹⁸ See infra notes 22-109 and accompanying text.

¹⁹ See infra notes 110-256 and accompanying text.

gars' First Amendment challenges.²⁰ Finally, Section IV explores begging's role in society and argues that it constitutes protected expression under the First Amendment. The section concludes that begging restrictions should be reviewed under the Public Forum doctrine.²¹

I. First Amendment Jurisprudence

First Amendment jurisprudence represents uneven terrain, battle-scarred by years of philosophical warfare. ²² Although the First Amendment occupies a preferred position in constitutional law, reflecting its fundamental role in our society, the Supreme Court has held that the guarantee of free expression is not absolute. ²⁸ Demarcating the scope of expressive freedom raises three initial concerns: the definition of "speech," the degree of scrutiny under which regulations are evaluated, and the fundamental values that guide First Amendment analysis. ²⁴

A. Speech v. Conduct Distinction

As a threshold issue, the courts examine whether an activity constitutes "speech" within the meaning of the First Amendment.²⁵ The Supreme Court has not limited the First Amendment to the spoken or written word, but has extended the Amendment's sweep to include conduct that conveys a message.²⁶ The protection of expressive conduct reflects the notion that the desire to promote ideas, not simply words, ²⁰ See infra notes 257-377 and accompanying text.

²¹ See infra notes 378-407 and accompanying text.

²² See Martin H. Redish, The Value of Free Speech, 130 U. Pa. L. Rev. 591, 591 (1982).

There seems to be general agreement that the Supreme Court has failed in its attempts to devise a coherent theory of free expression. These efforts have been characterized by a "pattern of aborted doctrines, shifting rationales, and frequent changes of position by individual Justices." Id.; see also Thomas Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 15 (1970). The First Amendment of the United States Constitution states in pertinent part: "Congress shall make no law... abridging the freedom of speech...."

²⁵ Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 19 (1971); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 110, 115 (1943); Rose, supra note 13, at 196.

²⁴ See Laurie Magid, Note, First Amendment Protection of Ambiguous Conduct, 84 COLUM. L. Rev. 467, 468 (1984).

²⁵ Magid, supra note 24, at 468.

²⁶ Melville B. Nimmer, The Meaning of Symbolic Speech Under the First Amendment, 21 UCLA L. Rev. 29, 30 (1973); Aaron Johnson, Note, The Second Circuit Refuses to Extend Beggars a Helping Hand: Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 69 Wash. U. L.Q. 969, 971 (1991); Sally A. Specht, Comment, The Wavering, Unpredictable Line Between "Speech" and Conduct: The Fate of Expressive Conduct After Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 40 Wash. U. J. Urb. & Contemp. L. 173, 173 (1991); see also Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 406 (1989) (burning American flag conveys message); Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405, 410 (1974) (taping peace symbol on American flag is expressive conduct); Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Community Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969) (wearing black armbands to protest Vietnam War conveys message); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131, 141–42 (1966) (sit-in at segregated library is expressive conduct).

underpins the First Amendment.²⁷ Protecting conduct, therefore, expands the potential range of messages and speakers.²⁸

The Supreme Court has struggled to distinguish between protected expression and ordinary conduct.²⁹ Commentators have noted that, unless telepathic, all speech necessarily involves conduct.³⁰ Conversely, every act contains within it, a "kernel of expression."³¹ Despite this tangled web of speech and conduct, the Supreme Court has made clear that First Amendment protection does not extend to an unlimited variety of acts.³² Commentators observe that the courts attempt to separate the expressive from the non-expressive elements of an act and then determine which aspect predominates.³³ This approach, however, becomes exceedingly difficult when the Court is faced with ambiguous conduct, that is, acts that may typically, but not always, be done for noncommunicative reasons.³⁴

In 1974, in Spence v. Washington, the Supreme Court articulated a two-factor test for distinguishing expressive from ordinary conduct.³⁵ The case involved the flag desecration conviction of a student who hung an American flag adorned with a peace symbol from his window to protest the U.S. invasion of Cambodia.³⁶ The Court held that, in order to be expressive conduct, first, the speaker must intend the conduct to convey a particularized message.³⁷ Second, the Court required a strong likelihood that the audience could discern the intended message.³⁸ Applying this standard, the Court concluded that ²⁷ Nimmer, supra note 26, at 33-34; see also Johnson, supra note 26, at 970-71.

²⁸ See Magid, supra note 24, at 471. Magid notes that protecting conduct avoids unduly benefitting those with high verbal abilities at the expense of those with other skills. Id. She also notes that "action...may be the only way [for small or unpopular groups] to effectively convey [their] views" to a wide audience. Id. Moreover, Magid emphasizes that protecting conduct expands the range of messages to a) those difficult to express in words and b) those in which the medium of conduct is the message. Id. (emphasis in the original).

²⁹ See Johnson, supra note 26, at 971-72; Magid, supra note 24, at 467.

⁵⁰ Nimmer, supra note 26, at 33; Johnson, supra note 26, at 971.

³¹ City of Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 25 (1989); see also Nimmer, supra note 26, at 36; Johnson, supra note 26, at 971.

³² United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376 (1968); Johnson, supra note 26, at 971; Magid, supra note 24, at 471; Specht, supra note 26, at 178.

³³ See John H. Ely, Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis, 88 HARV. L. Rev. 1482, 1495 (1975); Magid, supra note 24, at 475.

⁵⁴ See Magid, supra note 24, at 495 (sleeping); Chevigny, supra note 4, at 525.

³⁵ 418 U.S. 405, 411 (1974); see also Johnson, supra note 26, at 973; Stephanie M. Kaufman, Note, The Speech/Conduct Distinction and First Amendment Protection of Begging in Subways, 79 GEO. WASH. L.J. 1803, 1820; Specht, supra note 26, at 179.

³⁶ Spence, 418 U.S. at 406-07.

³⁷ See id. at 410-11; see also Johnson, supra note 26, at 973; Kaufman, supra note 35, at 1820; Specht, supra note 26, at 179.

³⁸ See Spence, 418 U.S. at 410-11; see also Johnson, supra note 26, at 973; Kaufman, supra note 35, at 1820; Specht, supra note 26, at 179.

the student's actions intended a clearly discernible message that was protected by the First Amendment.³⁹ Therefore, the Court invalidated the student's conviction.⁴⁰

Commentators have criticized the reliance on separating expression from ordinary conduct as a First Amendment technique.⁴¹ Some argue that the distinctions are conclusory and represent a hidden balancing of indeterminate factors.⁴² Others have criticized the Spence standard as too narrow, overlooking a powerful range of expression that defies being distilled into words.⁴³ Nevertheless, a court begins its First Amendment analysis by determining if a given activity constitutes speech, and must wrestle with distinguishing expressive from ordinary conduct under the Spence standard.⁴⁴

B. Degree of Scrutiny

1. Two-Track Analysis

Once an activity is found to be protectable speech, a court must determine the level of scrutiny to apply to restrictions on that activity. ⁴⁵ The United States Supreme Court has developed a bifurcated approach to judicial scrutiny, the two-track analysis, that hinges on the governmental purpose behind the restriction. ⁴⁶ "Content-based" restrictions directly aim at suppressing speech, whereas "content-neutral" regulations incidentally affect speech while targeting other activity. ⁴⁷

A content-based restriction is on track one and faces the most "exacting scrutiny." A court first examines whether the activity being ⁸⁹ Spence, 418 U.S. at 415.

⁴⁰ Id.

⁴¹ See, e.g., Chevigny, supra note 4, at 545; Kaufman, supra note 35, at 1824; Harry Kalven, Jr., The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, 1965 Sup. Cr. Rev. 1, 12 (1965); Helen Hershkoff & Adam S. Cohen, Begging to Differ: The First Amendment and the Right to Beg, 104 Harv. L. Rev. 896, 908 (1991).

⁴² See Kaufman, supra note 35, at 1821.

⁴³ Chevigny, supra note 4, at 545 ("too narrow, encompassing the discursive, the descriptive, even the polemical, and slighting the representational . . . one may give information about a social artifact . . . simply by representing it, by embodying the phenomenon"); see also C. Edwin Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 UCLA L. Rev. 964, 993 (1978); Kaufman, supra note 35, at 1824–25.

⁴⁴ Magid, supra note 24, at 468.

⁴⁵ Id.

⁴⁶ LAURENCE H. TRIBE, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 827, 791–92 (2d. ed. 1988); C. Thomas Dienes, The Trashing of the Public Forum: Problems in First Amendment Analysis, 55 Geo. WASH. L. Rev. 109, 114 (1986); Rose, supra note 13, at 211.

⁴⁷ See TRIBE, supra note 46, at 789-90.

⁴⁸ See id. at 791–92; Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 906; Rose, supra note 13, at 211.

regulated fits into an established category of unprotected speech, defined as such because public order and morality outweigh the speech's "slight social value." ⁴⁹ Unprotected speech includes fighting words, libel, obscenity and speech that "incite[s] an immediate breach of the peace." ⁵⁰ If the speech or activity is protected, a court will then determine if it falls into a category that deserves reduced protection, such as commercial speech. ⁵¹

If the speech does not fall into an excludable category, however, then content-based restrictions on that speech must survive strict scrutiny in order to be upheld.⁵² Under strict scrutiny, a court will determine whether the restriction is necessary to the furtherance of a compelling state interest, and narrowly tailored to serve that interest.⁵³ One commentator suggests that a critical factor in this evaluation is whether the government has used the "least speech-restrictive means."⁵⁴

Conversely, the courts evaluate content-neutral regulations under a lower level of scrutiny, the track two analysis.⁵⁵ In 1968, in United States v. O'Brien, the Supreme Court articulated the standard for reviewing such incidental restrictions on expressive conduct.⁵⁶ The defendant in the case had been convicted for burning his draft card in protest to the Vietnam War.⁵⁷ The Court determined that a restriction on expressive conduct was justified if: 1) the regulation was within the police power of the government; 2) the regulation furthered an important or substantial governmental interest; 3) the governmental interest was unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and 4) the incidental restriction was no greater than essential to the furtherance of the government's interests.⁵⁸ Under this standard, the Court upheld the defendant's conviction, reasoning that the Selective Service

⁴⁹ Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571–72 (1942); Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 211 & n.108.

⁵⁰ See Chaplinsky, 315 U.S. at 571-72.

⁵¹ See Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 907 (commercial speech does no more than propose a commercial transaction) (citing Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 762 (1976)).

⁵² See Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 906; Rose, supra note 13, at 211-12.

⁵⁸ Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 906; Rose, supra note 13, at 211-12.

⁵⁴Rose, supra note 13, at 212.

⁵⁵ See Tribe, supra note 46, at 792; Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 212.

⁵⁶ See 391 U.S. 367, 377 (1968).

⁵⁷ Id. at 369.

⁵⁸ Id. at 377.

Board had a substantial interest in efficient operation of the draft that justified the regulation.⁵⁹

Viewing the third prong as the content-neutrality threshold requirement, track two analysis can therefore be summarized as requiring incidental restrictions on speech to be narrowly tailored to achieve a significant government interest. 60 Commentators have observed that an important factor in being "narrowly tailored" is the existence of ample alternative channels of communication. 61 Commentators have described the looser scrutiny of incidental restrictions as a "form of interest balancing." 62

The Supreme Court has thus developed a two-track analysis for determining the level of scrutiny applicable to restrictions on expression.⁶³ On track one, a direct restriction on speech receives strict scrutiny, unless the speech falls into an excludable category.⁶⁴ On track two, an incidental restriction on expression receives a lower level of scrutiny and must only be narrowly tailored to serve a significant state interest.⁶⁵

2. The Public Forum Doctrine

In recent years, the Supreme Court has increasingly resorted to an alternative method to the two-track analysis for reviewing restrictions of expression on public property, the Public Forum doctrine.⁶⁶

⁵⁹ Id. at 382.

⁶⁰ Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 903 F.2d 146, 157 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 984 (1990).

⁶¹ Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 213.

⁶² Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 212-13.

⁶³ TRIBE, supra note 46, at 791-92; Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 211.

⁶⁴ Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 906; Rose, supra note 13, at 211-12.

⁶⁵ Dienes, supra note 46, at 114; Rose, supra note 13, at 212-13.

⁶⁶ Daniel A. Farber & John E. Nowak, The Misleading Nature of Public Forum Analysis: Content and Context in First Amendment Adjudication, 70 Va. L. Rev. 1219, 1220, 1221 & n.15 (1984). Based on LEXIS and WESTLAW searches, the authors asserted that the phrase "public forum" had only appeared in 32 Supreme Court decisions, twice prior to 1970 and 13 times after 1980. Id. at 1221 & n.15. Recent LEXIS and WESTLAW searches of the phrase "public forum" reinforce their observation; since 1984, the phrase arises in 14 cases, 5 after 1990: ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. 2701, 2705 (1992); Forsyth County, Ga. v. Nationalist Movement, 112 S. Ct. 2395, 2401 (1992); Burson v. Freeman 112 S. Ct. 1846, 1850 (1992); Renne v. Geary, 111 S. Ct. 2331, 2345 (1991); United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 727 (1990); Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 790 (1989); Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 479 (1988); City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Pub., 486 U.S. 750, 777 (1988); Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 321 (1988); Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 267 (1988); Board of Airport Comm'rs v. Jews for Jesus, 482 U.S. 569, 572 (1987); Pacific Gas & Elec. v. Public Utils. Comm'n of Cal., 475 U.S. 1, 33 (1986); Cornelius

This geographical approach hinges the degree of scrutiny accorded speech restrictions on a determination of the nature of the speech's forum.⁶⁷ Commentators theorize that the doctrine represents an attempt to formally accommodate competing societal interests.⁶⁸

The Public Forum doctrine originated in Professor Harry Kalven's 1965 article, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, which wrestled with the fundamental tension between expressive activity and the primary uses of government property.⁶⁹ The article argued for "a kind of First Amendment easement" to public property such as streets and parks, for all citizens.⁷⁰ Dismissing attempts to separate speech from conduct as confusing, Professor Kalven called for the development of a "New Robert's Rules of Order" for public fora.⁷¹ According to the article, accommodating as many speakers as possible without thwarting a forum's primary purposes should be the courts' focus.⁷²

Using Professor Kalven's article as a springboard, the Supreme Court has developed the modern public forum approach.⁷³ Although the doctrine's early usage primarily expanded speech opportunities by focusing on public fora, the Supreme Court recently has sharpened the original thesis by emphasizing the corollary that speech in non-public fora can be more freely restricted and such restrictions will be subject to a lesser degree of scrutiny.⁷⁴ Commentators articulate three general categories established by the Court to aid in determining the level of scrutiny: the traditional public forum, the designated public forum and the nonpublic forum.⁷⁵

v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985); United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675, 684 (1985).

⁶⁷ Farber & Nowak, supra note 66, at 1220; Rose, supra note 13, at 202.

⁶⁸ Dienes, supra note 46, at 115; Rose, supra note 13, at 202.

⁶⁹ See Kalven, supra note 41, at 15; Farber & Nowak, supra note 66, at 1221; Dienes, supra note 46, at 111-12; Stephen R. Welby, Note, Formalism in the Forum? United States v. Kokinda and the Extension of the Public Forum Doctrine, 69 Wash. U. L.Q. 957, 957 n.2 (1991). Professor Kalven derived the inspiration for his theory from Justice Roberts' reasoning twenty-six years prior:

Wherever the title of street and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens and discussing public questions. Such use of the streets and public places has from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights, and liberties of citizens.

Hague v. Committee for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 515 (1939).

⁷⁰ See Kalven, supra note 41, at 13.

⁷¹ See id. at 11-12.

⁷² See id. at 26-27.

⁷³ See Welby, supra note 69, at 957 n.2.

⁷⁴ See Dienes, supra note 46, at 110, 116.

⁷⁵ E.g. Farber & Nowak, supra note 66, at 1220-21 (citing Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 45, 46 (1983)); Cindy L. Meyer, Chapter, Free Speech v. Public Safety Within Public Forum Analysis, 59 Geo. WASH. L. Rev. 1285, 1291 (citing Cornelius v. NAACP Legal

Commentators describe traditional public fora as areas where expressive activity, such as speech and assembly, has historically occurred and, thus receives the greatest degree of protection. To Commentators frequently cite public parks, streets and sidewalks as "quintessential examples." In traditional public fora, regulations must be narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling state interest, and leave open ample alternatives in order to withstand scrutiny. To

The second category, the designated public forum, encompasses property that the government has intentionally opened to the public for expression.⁷⁹ Restrictions on speech in these fora receive the same strict scrutiny as those in traditional public fora.⁸⁰ Commentators note that, because the government decides whether the forum becomes public, it can also limit the forum to certain times or speakers or return the forum to nonpublic status.⁸¹ Justices Kennedy and Souter have proposed an alternative approach, however, that emphasizes examining the speech's compatibility with the property's normal uses.⁸²

The third category, nonpublic fora, comprises property that does not fit into the first two categories.⁸³ Commentators explain that speech & Educ. Defense Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985)); Rose, supra note 13, at 203. But see David Goldberger, Judicial Scrutiny in Public Forum Cases: Misplaced Trust in the Judgment of Public Officials, 32 Buff. L. Rev. 175, 185–202, 202 n.111 (1983) (views forum analysis as more of a continuum than separate categories).

⁷⁶ Farber, supra note 66, at 1220; Rose, supra note 13, at 203; Welby, supra note 69, at 960, 961; e.g., Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 480 (1988) (sidewalk in residential neighborhood); United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 179 (1983) (sidewalk surrounding the Supreme Court building).

⁷⁷ Farber, supra note 66, at 1220; Rose, supra note 13, at 203; Welby, supra note 69, at 960. One commentator argues that if pushed to make a distinction, sidewalks deserve more protection than streets. Rose, supra note 13, at 204–05.

⁷⁸ See Farber, supra note 66, at 1220; Welby, supra note 69, at 961. One commentator reasoned that speech must be highly protected in public for a because such for a are often the last resort of the "little man," the unpopular and poorly financed. Rose, supra note 13, at 204.

⁷⁹ Farber, supra note 66, at 1221; Dienes, supra note 46, at 119; Welby, supra note 69, at 960; see, e.g., Heffron v. International Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, 452 U.S. 640, 655 (1981) (state fairgrounds); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 267 (1981) (university meeting facilities). One commentator argues that whether the government intended to designate the forum for speech purposes should depend on three factors: 1) the government's policy and practice, 2) the property's nature, and 3) compatibility with expression. Welby, supra note 69, at 962.

⁸⁰ See, e.g., ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. 2701, 2705 (1992); Cornelius v. NAACP Legal & Educ. Defense Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985); Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 46 (1983).

81 Dienes, supra note 46, at 119; see also Perry, 460 U.S. at 46; Farber, supra note 66, at 1221.
82 ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. 2711, 2716 (1992) (Kennedy, J., concurring); ISKCON III, 112 S.
Ct. at 2724 (1992) (Souter, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see also Dienes, supra note 46, at 118.

⁸³ See Farber, supra note 66, at 1221; Welby, supra note 69, at 960–61 (citing cases); see also United States v. Kokinda, 110 S. Ct. 3115, 3120 (1990) (sidewalk leading to post office); Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 838 (1976) (military reservation); Lehman v. Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298, 302 (1974) (advertising space in city buses).

restrictions in these fora only have to be reasonable, and not aimed at a particular viewpoint to withstand scrutiny.⁸⁴ In these areas, the government's interests in promoting the forum's primary purpose overshadow the public's expressive easement.⁸⁵

Thus, the Public Forum doctrine attempts to reconcile competing societal interests by varying the scrutiny of speech restrictions according to a categorization of the speaker's forum.⁸⁶ Although, speech receives heightened protection in traditional and designated public fora, nonpublic fora regulations must only face a reasonableness standard.⁸⁷ The doctrine therefore promotes the maximization of expression by focusing on accommodating the multiplicity of interests and voices.⁸⁸

C. Values Underlying the First Amendment

Ultimately, theories on the meaning of freedom of expression and its importance guide the resolution of free speech controversies.⁸⁹ Commentators assert three general theories behind the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech: the Marketplace of Ideas, Democratic Process and Self-Realization.⁹⁰ If begging is to be protected under the First Amendment, it must advance at least one of these theories.⁹¹

The Marketplace of Ideas theory values freedom of speech as a means of uncovering the best possible perspective or solution.⁹² Theorists predicate this model on the belief that truth emerges from open and robust debate.⁹³ By refraining from interfering with expression, the government allows truth and falsehood to grapple openly and the resulting enlightenment benefits society as a whole.⁹⁴

⁸⁴ Dienes, supra note 46, at 116; Rose, supra note 13, at 203; Welby, supra note 69, at 961; see also Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 800. One commentator determines reasonableness "in light of the forum's purpose and all surrounding circumstances." Welby, supra note 69, at 962.

⁸⁵ See Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 800.

⁸⁶ Dienes, supra note 46, at 115; Rose, supra note 13, at 202.

⁸⁷ Farber, supra note 66, at 1220; Rose, supra note 13, at 202; Welby, supra note 69, at 960,

⁸⁸ See Kalven, supra note 41, at 26-27.

⁸⁹ See Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898.

⁹⁰ See EMERSON, subra note 22, at 6-7; Hershkoff & Cohen, subra note 41, at 898.

⁹¹ See Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898.

⁹² JOHN E. NOWAK & RONALD R. ROTUNDA, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 940 (4th ed. 1991); Baker, supra note 43, at 964; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898.

⁹⁸ Baker, supra note 43, at 964; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898; see also Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 (1919) (Holmes, J., dissenting) ("[T]he best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market").

⁹⁴ Nowak & Rotunda, supra note 92, at 940 (citing J. Milton, Areopagitica, A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England (John W. Hales ed., 1898)); see also Baker, supra note 43, at 964–65; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898.

The Democratic Process theory views freedom of speech as essential to the most effective operation of a democracy.⁹⁵ The best interests of the community necessitate that the decision-makers and the populace fully understand the public issues.⁹⁶ This model restricts First Amendment protection to public discussion of explicitly political issues, but within this sphere grants virtually absolute protection.⁹⁷ All other speech, including scientific and literary speech receives minimal protection.⁹⁸

Shifting away from societal justifications, the Self-Realization model emphasizes the primacy of freedom of expression in individual self-development. Gommentators note that expressive freedom enables individuals to define themselves and to give voice to their basic "human spirit." This model carves a broad sphere for protected expression, possibly even encompassing all nonviolent, noncoercive behavior. Having such a broad sweep allows the First Amendment to cover the many "inexpressible emotions" and ideas that defy being distilled into a discrete message. 102

These three general theories guide interpretation of the First Amendment guarantee of free speech.¹⁰³ The Marketplace of Ideas theory values free speech as the most effective means for uncovering truth.¹⁰⁴ The Democratic Process theory views freedom of speech as a means to improve citizens functioning within a democratic society.¹⁰⁵ The Self-Realization theory values expressive freedom for its role in individual development.¹⁰⁶

⁹⁵ See Robert H. Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1, 26 (1971); Alexander Meiklejohn, The First Amendment is an Absolute, 1961 Sup. Ct. Rev. 245, 255 (1961) [hereinafter Absolute]; see generally Alexander Meiklejohn, Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People 24 (1948) (discussing role of freedom of speech in representative democracy) [hereinafter Political Freedom].

⁹⁶ Political Freedom, supra note 95, at 26; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 901.

⁹⁷TRIBE, supra note 46, at 786. But see Absolute, supra note 95, at 256-57 (advocating inclusion of education, philosophy/science, literature/art).

⁹⁸ TRIBE, supra note 46, at 786.

⁹⁹ See Tribe, supra note 46, at 787; Baker, supra note 43, at 966; Redish, supra note 22, at 593.

¹⁰⁰ Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 903; Redish, supra note 22, at 593.

¹⁰¹ See Baker, supra note 43, at 964.

¹⁰² See Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 25, 26 (1971) ("the inexpressible emotions" that come "under the protection of free speech as fully as do Keats' poems or Donne's sermons"); Baker, supra note 43, at 993 (storytelling as example).

¹⁰³ See Emerson, supra note 22, at 6-7; Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 898.

¹⁰⁴ See Nowak & Rotunda, supra note 92, at 940; Baker, supra note 43, at 964.

¹⁰⁵ See Bork, supra note 95, at 26; Absolute, supra note 95, at 255.

¹⁰⁶ See Tribe, supra note 46, at 787; Baker, supra note 43, at 962; Redish, supra note 22, at 593.

In sum, a court begins its First Amendment analysis by defining "speech," and thereby delimiting the scope of protection. ¹⁰⁷ A court must then determine the appropriate level of scrutiny to apply in evaluating a regulation of protected speech via the two-track analysis or under the Public Forum doctrine. ¹⁰⁸ Overall, a court will proceed with its First Amendment analysis guided by various theories of the speech's importance. ¹⁰⁹

II. HISTORY OF CHARITABLE SOLICITATION

Courts have used a First Amendment analysis to determine the relationship between free speech and the solicitation of funds by organized charities. Part A of this section explores three Supreme Court cases in this area from the 1980s, known as the Schaumburg trilogy, that taken collectively, lay out a broad vision of charitable solicitation as protected expression. Part B of this section explores International Society of Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, a recent Supreme Court case that dealt with charitable solicitation under the Public Forum doctrine.

A. The Schaumburg Trilogy

In 1980, in Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, the United States Supreme Court held a regulation of charitable solicitation to be unconstitutional. Under the regulation, the Village of Schaumburg ("Village") denied the Citizens for a Better Environment ("CBE") a solicitation permit because less than seventy-five percent of CBE's contributions went toward "charitable purposes." First, the Court reasoned that charitable solicitation constituted protected speech under the First Amendment. Second, under strict scrutiny, the Court determined that the regulation did not sufficiently further the Village's asserted interests to outweigh the infringement on expres-

¹⁰⁷ See supra notes 25-44 and accompanying text.

¹⁰⁸ See supra notes 45-88 and accompanying text.

¹⁰⁹ See supra notes 89-106 and accompanying text.

¹¹⁰ See Riley v. National Fed'n of the Blind of N.C., 487 U.S. 781, 787–802 (1988); Secretary of State of Md. v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 959–69 (1984); Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 444 U.S. 620, 629–39 (1980); Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 904.

¹¹¹ See infra notes 113-207 and accompanying text.

¹¹² See infra notes 208-256 and accompanying text.

^{118 444} U.S. at 639,

¹¹⁴ Id. at 622-25.

¹¹⁵ Id. at 633.

sion.¹¹⁶ Thus, the Court concluded that the regulation failed First Amendment scrutiny.¹¹⁷

The Village regulated solicitation on public property within its borders by means of a permit scheme. Before granting a permit, the Village required organizations to show that at least seventy-five percent of their receipts went toward charitable purposes. He Village denied the application of CBE, an environmental advocacy group, for failure to meet this standard. In response, CBE sued the Village alleging that the seventy-five percent rule contravened the First Amendment.

First, the Court held that the First Amendment protected charitable solicitation. ¹²² The Court reasoned that the solicitation of funds by organized groups involved several protectable speech interests —"communication of information, the dissemination and propagation of views and ideas, and the advocacy of causes." ¹²³ The Court also emphasized that a group's ability to speak depended on donated funds and thus, the Court considered CBE's door-to-door solicitation protectable. ¹²⁴

Next, the Court determined that the regulation directly restricted speech.¹²⁵ The Court reasoned that the regulation prevented groups with advocacy as their primary purpose from soliciting in the town.¹²⁶ The Court emphasized that advocacy groups could reasonably expend more than twenty-five percent of their funds on administrative costs.¹²⁷ Under a track one analysis, the Court concluded that the regulation unconstitutionally abridged the expressive freedom of advocacy groups unless justified by sufficiently strong interests of the Village.¹²⁸

¹¹⁶ Id. at 636.

¹¹⁷ Id. at 639.

¹¹⁸ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 622–23. SCHAUMBURG VILLAGE, ILL., Code, ch. 22, art. III, § 22–20 states: "Every charitable organization, which solicits or intends to solicit contributions from persons in the village by door-to-door solicitation or the use of the public streets and public ways, shall prior to such solicitation apply for a permit."

¹¹⁹ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 624. SCHAUMBURG VILLAGE, ILL., CODE, ch. 22, art. III, § 22–20(g) requires: "[s]atisfactory proof that at least seventy-five per cent [sic] of the proceeds of such solicitations will be used directly for the charitable purpose of the organization."

¹²⁰ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 625. Affidavits revealed that in 1975, the Citizens for a Better Environment ("CBE") spent 23.3% of proceeds on fundraising and 21.5% on administration while, in 1976, 23.3% went to fundraising and 16.5% to administration. Id. at 626.

¹²¹ Id. at 625.

¹²² See id. at 628-32 (citing cases).

¹²³ Id. at 632.

¹²⁴ Id. at 632-33.

¹²⁵ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 636.

¹²⁶ See id. at 635-37.

¹²⁷ Id. at 635.

¹²⁸ See id. at 636.

Finally, the Schaumburg Court determined that the seventy-five percent rule only "peripherally" advanced the Village's interests while less speech-restrictive alternatives existed. ¹²⁹ The Court addressed three alleged interests of the Village: preventing fraud, protecting public safety, and protecting residential privacy. ¹³⁰ First, the Court reasoned that the Village's principal justification, the prevention of fraud, rested on the mistaken correlation between the amount spent on administration and fraud. ¹⁵¹ The Court again stressed that advocacy groups might reasonably need to spend more than twenty-five percent of receipts on administration. ¹⁵² In addition, the Court noted that less intrusive means would better prevent fraud. ¹³³

Second, the Court dismissed any relation between public safety and the amount spent on administration.¹³⁴ Finally, the Court noted that the seventy-five percent rule only furthered residential privacy indirectly, by reducing the overall number of solicitors.¹³⁵ The Court stressed that solicitors who spent less than twenty-five percent on costs, and those that spent more, annoyed residents equally.¹³⁶ The Court also suggested that the ability of homeowners to bar solicitors from their property maintained privacy more effectively, and less intrusively.¹³⁷

Justice Rehnquist dissented from the Court's decision extending First Amendment protection to solicitation. ¹³⁸ He reasoned that a community had the right to insulate itself from causes it deems unworthy. ¹³⁹ Justice Rehnquist charged the majority's opinion with eviscerating community control over itself, overvaluing the constitutional importance of door-to-door solicitation and failing to provide any useful or coherent guidance to towns affected by the ruling. ¹⁴⁰

Thus, in Schaumburg, the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech protected solicitation by organized charities.¹⁴¹ In its reasoning, the Court emphasized that the Village

¹²⁹ Id. at 636.

¹³⁰ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 636-38.

¹³¹ See id. at 636-37.

¹³² Id. at 636-37.

¹⁸³ Id. at 637. The Court suggested criminalizing fraudulent representations and promoting disclosure of a charitable organizations' finances as less intrusive alternatives. Id. at 637–38.

¹³⁴ Id. at 638.

¹³⁵ Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 638.

¹³⁶ Id.

¹³⁷ Id. at 639.

¹³⁸ Id. at 644 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹³⁹ Id. at 644 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁴⁰ See Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 643-44 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁴¹ See id. at 632.

ordinance hindered the ability of organizations oriented toward the advocacy of causes to effectively solicit contributions. The Court concluded that the seventy-five percent rule was not narrowly tailored to prevent fraud, especially in light of less speech-restrictive alternatives. 148

Similarly, in 1984, in Secretary of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., the Court struck down a Maryland regulation on charitable solicitation. The regulation allowed for the waiver of a twenty-five percent limitation on contributions used to finance fundraising activities if the group would be unable to solicit otherwise. First, the Court relied on Schaumburg to hold that charitable solicitation constituted protected expression. Next, the Court reasoned that the possibility of waiver did not correct the deficiencies in the Schaumburg regulation. The Court concluded that the regulation violated the First Amendment. Amendment.

In Munson, the State prohibited charitable organizations from using more than twenty-five percent of donations to pay their fundraising expenses. ¹⁴⁹ The regulation, however, allowed the Secretary of State to waive the limitation upon determination that it prevented a charity from effectively soliciting. ¹⁵⁰ The plaintiff, a professional fundraiser, regularly charged a client more than the mandated twenty-five percent of receipts. ¹⁵¹ After being notified of its non-compliance with the regulation, the plaintiff sued, alleging that the statute infringed its First Amendment rights. ¹⁵²

¹⁴² Id. at 635.

¹⁴³ Id. at 636.

^{144 467} U.S. 947, 950 (1984).

¹⁴⁵ Id. at 950 & n.2.

¹⁴⁶ See id. at 959.

¹⁴⁷ See id. at 962-68.

¹⁴⁸ Id. at 970.

¹⁴⁹ Munson, 467 U.S. at 950. MD. ANN. CODE of 1957, art. 41, § 103D stated in pertinent part: "(a) A charitable organization other than a charitable salvage organization may not pay or agree to pay as expenses in connection with any fundraising activity a total amount in excess of 25 percent of the total gross income raised or received by reason of the fund-raising activity."

¹⁵⁰ See Munson, 467 U.S. at 952. MD. ANN. CODE of 1957, art. 41, § 103D stated in pertinent part:

The Secretary of State shall issue rules and regulations to permit a charitable organization to pay or agree to pay for expenses in connection with a fund-raising activity more than 25% of its total gross income in those instances where the 25% limitation would effectively prevent the charitable organization from raising contributions.

¹⁵¹ Munson, 467 U.S. at 950-51.

¹⁵² Id. at 951-52.

After reviewing Schaumburg, the Court observed that the regulation must fall unless it could be distinguished.¹⁵³ The Court reasoned, however, that the waiver provision was too narrow to distinguish this regulation from the one in Schaumburg because the waiver restricted the exception to financial necessity.¹⁵⁴ The Court emphasized that the waiver did not apply to organizations that chose to divert more than twenty-five percent of their receipts to administration for strategic reasons.¹⁵⁵ The Court also determined that the waiver provision failed to address the regulation's flawed premise, that high solicitation costs correlate to fraud.¹⁵⁶ The Court noted that the regulation in no way prevented the actual fraudulent misdirection of funds, although it did restrict the speech of groups that chose high-cost strategies.¹⁵⁷ Thus, the Court concluded that the twenty-five percent limitation unnecessarily chilled the exercise of free speech.¹⁵⁸

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Rehnquist distinguished the regulation from the Schaumburg ordinance.¹⁵⁹ He first reasoned that the statute merely regulated the organizations' economic relations with professional fundraisers.¹⁶⁰ Justice Rehnquist noted that any impact on speech was indirect and outweighed by governmental interests.¹⁶¹ Furthermore, Justice Rehnquist emphasized the statute's "crucial" differences from the Schaumburg regulation.¹⁶² Justice Rehnquist concluded that the regulation survived First Amendment scrutiny.¹⁶³

In sum, in Munson, the Supreme Court further developed the Schaumburg holding that charitable solicitation constituted protected speech.¹⁶⁴ In its reasoning, the Munson Court highlighted the mistaken premise of the regulation at issue, that high administrative costs indi-

¹⁵³ Id. at 959-62.

¹⁵⁴ See id. at 963.

¹⁵⁵ See id. The Court used the example of a group enduring high costs because they elected to disseminate information as part of fundraising. Id.

¹⁵⁶ Munson, 467 U.S. at 966.

¹⁵⁷ Id. at 966-67.

¹⁵⁸ See id. at 968.

¹⁵⁹ Id. at 975 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁶⁰ Id. at 978-79 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁶¹ Munson, 467 U.S. at 979-80 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁶² Id. at 981-83 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). First, Justice Rehnquist observed that the regulation did not include administrative and overhead costs unrelated to solicitation in calculating the 25%. Id. at 982. Second, he noted that the statute also excluded many costs from combined solicitation-advocacy events. Id. Third, Justice Rehnquist emphasized the waiver provision. Id. at 983. Fourth, he observed that the regulation apparently allocated remaining expenses pro rata between solicitation and advocacy. Id. at 983-84.

¹⁶³ See id. at 985 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

¹⁶⁴ See id. at 962.

cated fraud.¹⁶⁵ Therefore, the Court concluded that despite the waiver provisions, the regulation in Munson was unconstitutional.¹⁶⁶

In 1988, in the final case of the trilogy, Riley v. National Federation of the Blind of North Carolina, the Supreme Court struck down a regulation on solicitation by professional fundraisers. ¹⁶⁷ A group of professional fundraisers, charities and possible donors challenged a statute that set fundraisers' fees and governed their activities. ¹⁶⁸ The Court reiterated that the First Amendment protected charitable solicitation. ¹⁶⁹ The Court also emphasized that the fundraisers' professional status did not alter their First Amendment rights. ¹⁷⁰ Thus, the Court held the regulation unconstitutional. ¹⁷¹

The regulation in Riley had three relevant provisions.¹⁷² First, the reasonable fee provision set up a three-tier scheme for evaluating professional fundraisers' fees against total contributions.¹⁷³ The regulation deemed fees constituting up to twenty percent of the gross receipts of all solicitations to be reasonable, those between twenty and thirty-five percent presumptively reasonable unless shown not to involve advocacy interests, and fees over thirty-five percent presumptively

¹⁶⁵ Id. at 966.

¹⁶⁶ Munson, 467 U.S. at 970.

^{167 487} U.S. 781, 784 (1988).

¹⁶⁸ See id. at 786-87.

¹⁶⁹ Id. at 789.

¹⁷⁰ See id. at 801-02.

¹⁷¹ Id. at 803.

¹⁷² See Riley, 487 U.S. at 784.

¹⁷⁸ See id.; N.C. GEN. STAT. § 131C-17.2 (1986) provided:

⁽a) No professional fund-rais[er] . . . may charge . . . an excessive and unreasonable fund-raising fee. . . .

⁽b)[A] fund-raising fee of twenty percent (20%) or less of the gross receipts of all solicitations . . . is deemed to be reasonable and nonexcessive.

⁽c)[A] fund-raising fee greater than twenty percent (20%) but less than thirty-five percent (35%) of the gross receipts of all solicitations . . . is excessive and unreasonable if the party challenging the fund-raising fee also proves that the solicitation does not involve the dissemination of information, discussion, or advocacy relating to public issues as directed by the [charitable organization] which is to benefit from the solicitation.

⁽d)[A] fund-raising fee of thirty-five percent (35%) or more of the gross receipts of all solicitations . . . may be excessive and unreasonable without further evidence. . . . The professional fund-rais[er] . . . may successfully defend the fund-raising fee by proving that the level of the fee charged was necessary:

⁽¹⁾ Because of the dissemination of information, discussion, or advocacy relating to public issues as directed by the [charitable organization] which is to benefit from the solicitation, or unreasonable unless justifiable on the grounds of advocacy or financial necessity.¹⁷⁴ Second, the regulation required professional fundraisers to disclose to potential donors the percentage of revenues retained as a fee in prior solicitations.¹⁷⁵ Finally, the regulation required professional fundraisers to obtain a license before engaging in charitable solicitation.¹⁷⁶

⁽²⁾ Because otherwise the ability of the [charitable organization] which is to benefit from the solicitations to raise money or communicate its ideas, opinions, and positions to the public would be significantly diminished.

The Court first held that the reasonable fee provision was indistinguishable from the percentage based fee schemes held unconstitutional in Schaumburg and Munson. 177 The plaintiff in Riley attempted to distinguish the statute by asserting an interest in promoting the maximum yield to the charity, but the Court disagreed for three reasons. 178 First, the Court thought this justification reflected an incorrect view of solicitation as merely commercial speech, and thus subject to less protection under the First Amendment, an issue firmly settled by Schaumburg. 179 Second, the Court considered paternalistic protection of charities misplaced in areas of free speech. 180 Third, the Court stressed valid reasons that charities may stray from the statutory guidelines. 181 Finally, the Court determined that the ability to rebut the fee presumptions chilled free expression, rather than distinguishing the regulation.¹⁸² The Court observed that this system forced charities to defend their tactics on a case-by-case basis. 183 Therefore, according to the Court, the specter of litigation would always overshadow efforts at

During any solicitation and before requesting or appealing either directly or indirectly for any charitable contribution a professional solicitor shall disclose to the person solicited:

- (1) His name; and,
- (2) The name of the ... professional fund-rais[er] ... by whom he is employed and the address of his employer; and
- (3) The average of the percentage of gross receipts actually paid to the [charitable organizations] by the professional fund-rais[er]... conducting the solicitation for all charitable sales promotions conducted in this State by that professional fund-rais[er]... for the past 12 months, or for all completed charitable sales promotions where the professional fund-rais[er]... has been soliciting funds for less than 12 months.

¹⁷⁴ Riley, 487 U.S. at 784-85.

¹⁷⁵ Id. at 784; N.C. GEN. STAT. § 131C-16.1 (1986) provided:

¹⁷⁶ Riley, 487 U.S. at 784; N.C. GEN. STAT. § 131C-6 (1986) provided: "Any person who acts as a professional fund-rais[er]... shall apply for and obtain an annual license from the Department, and shall not act as a professional fund-rais[er]... until after obtaining such license."

¹⁷⁷ See Riley, 487 U.S. at 787-95.

¹⁷⁸ Id. at 789-90.

^{· 179} Id. at 790.

¹⁸⁰ Id. at 790-91.

¹⁸¹ Id. at 791-92.

¹⁸² Riley, 487 U.S. at 792-94.

¹⁸³ Id. at 793.

solicitation and obtaining professional help, especially for small and unpopular groups.¹⁸⁴ Thus, the Court declared the statute's reasonable fee scheme unconstitutional.¹⁸⁵

The Court next considered the disclosure requirement and concluded that it directly restricted speech. ¹⁸⁶ The Court reasoned that by mandating specific speech, the provision became a content-based restriction, properly subject to exacting scrutiny. ¹⁸⁷ Noting that existing law already required disclosure of professional status upon request, the Court determined that the intangible benefits from wider publicity of the message outweighed the state's asserted interests in fraud prevention. ¹⁸⁸ Furthermore, the Court again emphasized the undue injury to small and unpopular charities forced to rely on professionals. ¹⁸⁹ Finally, the Court noted the existence of more narrowly tailored alternatives. ¹⁹⁰ Thus, the Court concluded that the disclosure requirement failed to withstand First Amendment strict scrutiny. ¹⁹¹

Finally, the Court invalidated the licensing requirement, stressing that speakers do not lose First Amendment rights merely because they are compensated.¹⁹² By allowing a limitless delay, the Court reasoned that the statute accorded the licensor too much discretion.¹⁹⁸ Thus, the Court concluded that the licensing scheme unreasonably regulated the time, place and manner of speech.¹⁹⁴

In a dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Rehnquist argued against subjecting the regulation of professional fundraisers to strict scrutiny. 195

¹⁸⁴ See id. at 793-94.

¹⁸⁵ Id. at 784.

¹⁸⁶ See id. at 795-801.

¹⁸⁷ See Riley, 487 U.S. at 795–96. The Court refused to separate the commercial component of the speech from the "persuasive" part. Id. Also, the Court noted that precedents revealed no distinction of constitutional significance between compelled speech and compelled silence. Id. at 796.

¹⁸⁸ See id. at 798.

¹⁸⁹ Id. at 799.

¹⁹⁰ Id. at 800. The Court noted that the state could publish financial disclosure statements itself, or more vigorously enforce existing antifraud statutes. Id.

¹⁹¹ Id. at 803.

¹⁹² See Riley, 487 U.S. at 801-02.

¹⁹³ See id. at 802.

¹⁹⁴ See id. In a concurring opinion, Justice Scalia agreed with the majority despite questioning dictum indicating that requiring a fundraiser merely to disclose professional status would withstand First Amendment scrutiny. See id. at 803 (Scalia, J., concurring). Justice Stevens concurred with most of the majority's opinion but dissented from the Court's conclusion that the licensing requirement was unconstitutional. Id. at 804 (Stevens, J., concurring).

¹⁹⁵ See id. at 808 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting). In 1986, subsequent to the Schaumburg and Munson decisions, Justice Rehnquist was elevated to the position of Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

First, he argued that the reasonable fee provision was merely an economic regulation with only a minimal burden on speech. ¹⁹⁶ Chief Justice Rehnquist further argued that the fee provision would even withstand strict scrutiny because of the government's strong interest in preventing fraud and the fact that the regulation was not a blanket prohibition. ¹⁹⁷ Second, the Chief Justice addressed the disclosure requirement and determined that requiring the disclosure of true facts in a commercial transaction did not infringe on free speech. ¹⁹⁸ Finally, he approved the licensing requirement on the grounds that it only incidentally affected the charities' speech. ¹⁹⁹ Chief Justice Rehnquist concluded that the entire regulation deserved a lower degree of scrutiny and should stand. ²⁰⁰

In Riley, the Supreme Court elaborated on the Schaumburg and Munson holdings, explicitly extending First Amendment protection to professional fundraisers' activities.²⁰¹ In its reasoning, the Court emphasized the regulation's burden on the speech of small and unpopular advocacy groups.²⁰² The Court concluded that the regulation's three provisions, the reasonable fee scheme, the disclosure requirement and the licensing requirement, all failed to withstand First Amendment scrutiny.²⁰³

The Schaumburg trilogy establishes that charitable solicitation constitutes protected speech under the First Amendment.²⁰⁴ The three cases note that solicitation cannot be separated from a group's essential message.²⁰⁵ Charitable solicitation aids in disseminating the message as well as ensuring its continuing survival.²⁰⁶ In addition, the Supreme Court has indicated that those who personally benefit from the solicitation, such as professional fundraisers, nevertheless retain First Amendment protection.²⁰⁷

¹⁹⁶ See id. at 807 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

¹⁹⁷ Riley, 487 U.S. at 808, 809 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

¹⁹⁸ Id. at 811 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

¹⁹⁹ Id. at 812 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

²⁰⁰ See id. at 814 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

²⁰¹ See id. at 787-95, 801-02.

²⁰² Riley, 487 U.S. at 793, 799.

²⁰³ See id. at 803.

²⁰⁴ See id. at 787-95; Secretary of State of Md. v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 959 (1984); Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 494 U.S. 620, 632 (1980).

²⁰⁵ E.g. Riley, 487 U.S. at 796; Munson, 467 U.S. at 959-60; Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 632.

²⁰⁶ See Riley, 487 U.S. at 796; Munson, 467 U.S. at 959-60; Schaumburg, 444 U.S. at 632.

²⁰⁷ Riley, 487 U.S. at 801-02.

B. International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee

Then, in 1992, in International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee ("ISKCON I"), the Supreme Court upheld a New York Port Authority regulation banning in-person solicitation of funds in airport terminals.²⁰⁸ In a companion decision, Lee v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness ("ISKCON II"), the Court struck down the same regulation as applied to the distribution of literature.²⁰⁹ The regulation prevented the Krishna adherents from performing sankirtan, a ritual involving in-person solicitation of funds, in New York metropolitan airports.210 Under the Public Forum doctrine, the ISKCON I Court reasoned that the airport was a nonpublic forum, therefore the regulation only had to be reasonable.²¹¹ The Court concluded that the Port Authority's interests in limiting solicitation were reasonable and the regulation could stand.²¹² The ISKCON II Court, however, determined that leafletting did not present the same "dangers" as solicitation. 218 Thus, the Court struck down the prohibition on distributing literature in the terminal.²¹⁴ Writing separately, in International Society of Krishna Consciousness v. Lee ("ISKCON III"), Justices O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter focused their forum analyses more on the objective characteristics of the terminals than had the ISKCON I Court. 215

The ISKCON I Court determined that the airport terminals were nonpublic fora because neither tradition nor purpose indicated oth-

^{208 112} S. Ct. 2701, 2709 (1992). The Port Authority regulation stated in pertinent part:

^{1.} The following conduct is prohibited within the interior areas of buildings or structures at an air terminal if conducted by a person to or with passers-by in a continuous or repetitive manner:

⁽a) The sale or distribution of any merchandise, including but not limited to jewelry, foodstuffs, candles, flowers, badges and clothing.

⁽b) The sale or distribution of flyers, brochures, pamphlets, books or any other printed or written material.

⁽c) Solicitation or receipt of funds.

Id. at 2704.

²⁰⁹ 112 S. Ct. 2709, 2710 (1992).

²¹⁰ ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2704.

²¹¹ Id. at 2705-06.

²¹² See id. at 2706, 2709.

²¹³ ISKCON II, 112 S. Ct. at 2710 (citing reasoning in ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. 2711, 2713–14 (1992) (O'Connor, J., concurring)).

²¹⁴ Id. at 2710.

²¹⁵ See 112 S. Ct. at 2712, 2716 (O'Connor, J., concurring); ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2716 (Kennedy, J., concurring); ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2724 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

erwise.²¹⁶ First, the Court reasoned that the relatively recent historical emergence of airports prevented them from qualifying as traditional public fora.²¹⁷ Second, the Court decided that the terminals were not designated public fora because the Port Authority considered their purpose the facilitation of passenger air travel, not the promotion of expression.²¹⁸ Moreover, the Court found no indication in the manner of operation of the airports that the terminals had been dedicated to open expression.²¹⁹ After ruling out traditional and designated public fora, the Court concluded that the airport terminals were nonpublic fora and the regulation should be held to a reasonableness standard.²²⁰

Under this reasonableness standard, the Court articulated the Port Authority's three legitimate interests in banning in-person solicitation. ²²¹ First, the Court stressed that solicitation had a disruptive effect on business. ²²² Second, the Court observed that in-person solicitation impeded the flow of traffic. ²²³ Third, according to the Court, face-to-face solicitation presented risks of duress, an appropriate target for regulation. ²²⁴ The Court then noted that the alternative of performing sankirtan on the sidewalk outside the terminal mitigated adverse effects on speech. ²²⁵ The ISKCON I Court concluded that these interests justified the regulation as reasonable and thus constitutional. ²²⁶

In ISKCON II, the Court invalidated the companion ban on distribution of literature in Port Authority terminals.²²⁷ As justification, the ISKCON II Court cited the reasoning in Justices O'Connor's, Kennedy's and Souter's separate ISKCON III opinions that followed.²²⁸ In a dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Rehnquist disagreed with the Court's invalidation of the prohibition on literature distribution.²²⁹ The ²¹⁶ ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2706, 2708.

²¹⁷ Id. at 2706. In addition, solicitation in airports did not appear until recently, too late even to be traditional solely for airports. Id. The Court dismissed the argument that the terminals were heir to the expressive activity traditionally conducted at "transportation nodes," such as train stations. Id. at 2707. The Court noted that bus and train stations were often under private ownership and, moreover, that airports may have critical differences with more conventional transportation nodes. Id.

²¹⁸ Id. at 2707.

²¹⁹ Id.

²²⁰ See id. at 2708.

²²¹ See ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2708.

²²² Id.

²²³ Id.

²²⁴ Id.

²²⁵ Id. at 2708-09.

²²⁶ See ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2708-09.

²²⁷ ISKCON II, 112 S. Ct. 2709, 2710 (1992).

²²⁸ Id.

²²⁹ Id. at 2710 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

Chief Justice emphasized that leafletting presented identical congestion risks as solicitation, in addition to unique problems, such as the creation of litter.²⁵⁰ The Chief Justice concluded that without a more significant distinction between the risks presented by the two activities, the Court's decision allowed excludable conduct in through the back door.²³¹

In an opinion in ISKCON III, Justice O'Connor concurred in both the ISKCON I and ISKCON II decisions.²³² She agreed that the terminals were nonpublic fora and therefore, the regulation should be held to a reasonableness standard.²³³ Justice O'Connor, however, emphasized that reasonableness must be determined in light of all surrounding circumstances.²³⁴ She argued that the airport terminals constituted a large multipurpose complex rather than an environment with the sole purpose of air travel.²³⁵ Nevertheless, Justice O'Connor concluded that in-person solicitation was incompatible with the terminals' functioning in a way that leafletting was not and thus, concurred with the Court's decisions.²³⁶

In ISKCON III, Justice Kennedy also agreed with the Court's results in ISKCON I and II, despite concluding that the terminals were public fora. ²³⁷ He argued that basing forum status on the government's express characterization, as the majority did, eviscerated the First Amendment by allowing the government to set the standard of review. ²³⁸ Instead, Justice Kennedy advocated focusing on a property's actual objective qualities, and articulated three factors to examine. ²³⁹ In his opinion, the Court should consider a property's shared physical similarities with traditional public fora, whether the government has permitted broad public access to the property, and whether expressive activity would interfere in a significant way with the uses of the property. ²⁴⁰

²³⁰ Id. (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

²³¹ See id. (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

²³² 112 S. Ct. at 2711 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

²⁵⁵ Id. at 2711-12 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

²³⁴ Id. at 2712 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

²³⁵ Id. at 2712–13 (O'Connor, J., concurring). Justice O'Connor noted that the terminals functioned as "a shopping mall as well as an airport." Id. at 2713.

²³⁶ See id. at 2713-15 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

²³⁷ ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2715 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

²³⁸ See id. at 2716 (Kennedy, J., concurring). Justice Kennedy also admonished the Court for taking refuge in "history;" he contended that the reality must be faced that new "public fora" will develop as society changes. Id. at 2717.

²⁵⁹ Id. at 2716, 2718 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

²⁴⁰ Id. at 2718 (Kennedy, J., concurring). Justice Kennedy also suggested taking into account the availability of reasonable time, place and manner restrictions. Id. at 2718.

Applying this standard to the facts before him, Justice Kennedy determined that the terminals were public fora.²⁴¹ Nevertheless, he reasoned that the solicitation ban survived the strict scrutiny test.²⁴² Justice Kennedy emphasized the prevention of fraud and duress, often linked to in-person solicitation, and the existence of satisfactory alternatives.²⁴⁸ On the other hand, he concluded that the distribution ban could not withstand the scrutiny of a public forum.²⁴⁴ Justice Kennedy reasoned that leafletting presented less risk of fraud and that the regulation left open fewer alternatives.²⁴⁵

Concurring in part and dissenting in part, Justice Souter agreed with striking down the distribution ban, but argued that the solicitation ban also failed First Amendment scrutiny. He supported Justice Kennedy's conception of the Public Forum doctrine, asserting that the classification of government property should rest on the compatibility of its uses and physical characteristics with expressive activity. Justice Souter agreed that the terminals were public fora, and the regulation should be subjected to strict scrutiny. Unlike Justice Kennedy, however, he concluded that solicitation for immediate payment was compatible with the airport terminals and the ban should be invalidated.

In ISKCON, the Supreme Court used the Public Forum doctrine to determine the appropriate degree of scrutiny to review the Port Authority's regulation of expressive activity.²⁵⁰ The majority opinion ²⁴¹ Id. at 2719 (Kennedy, J., concurring). First, he emphasized the physical similarities between the airport corridors and the quintessential public fora, public streets. Id. Next, he noted that the terminals were open to the public without restriction. Id. Finally, Justice Kennedy found that expressive activity was compatible with the function of the airport. Id.

²⁴² ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2720 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

²⁴³ See id. at 2721, 2722–23 (Kennedy, J., concurring). Justice Kennedy interpreted the regulation to prohibit only solicitation for immediate payment, leaving open such alternatives as handing out preaddressed envelopes. Id. at 2723.

²⁴⁴ Id. at 2723 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

²⁴⁵ Id. (Kennedy, J., concurring).

²⁴⁶ Id. at 2724-25 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

²⁴⁷ ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2724 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part). Justice Souter described the forum analysis categories as "archetypes," representing broad characteristics of fora. See id. Moreover, he warned of the twin dangers of allowing history to close a category and of treating the categories as overly static. Id.

²⁴⁸ Id. at 2725 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

²⁴⁹ See id. at 2725, 2726 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part). Justice Souter argued against the solicitation ban for primarily two reasons. See id. at 2725. He first concluded that no strong government interest justified the prohibition. See id. at 2725–26. Justice Souter reasoned that pedestrians' relative freedom to simply walk away undermined the asserted interest in preventing fraud and duress. Id. He also dismissed the alleged interest in combatting congestion by noting the corridors' similarity to city streets. Id. at 2725 n.1. Second, Justice Souter indicated the lack of reasonable alternatives, and dismissed Justice Kennedy's suggestion of distributing preaddressed envelopes as unrealistic. Id. at 2727.

²⁵⁰ See ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. at 2705.

reasoned that the airports were nonpublic fora because neither tradition nor the Port Authority's characterization of the terminals' purposes indicated otherwise. ²⁵¹ Therefore, the Court concluded that the solicitation ban was constitutional and the distribution ban was not. ²⁵² The separate opinions in ISKCON III however, suggested that forum analysis should focus more on the objective physical characteristics of the airport, and their compatibility with solicitation and leafletting. ²⁵³

In sum, the ISKCON decision accepts the basic holding of the Schaumburg trilogy, that charitable solicitation is so intertwined with dissemination of a group's message that it deserves First Amendment protection.²⁵⁴ The ISKCON Court, however, determined the degree of scrutiny with which to review the Port Authority regulation via a Public Forum doctrine analysis.²⁵⁵ The Court effectively tied its balancing of competing interests to a characterization of the nature of the forum.²⁵⁶

III. TREATMENT OF BEGGING BY THE COURTS

Unlike charitable solicitation, begging, until recently, has received scant attention from the courts.²⁵⁷ In fact, when a begging case appeared before a court, the court often overlooked the First Amendment element entirely.²⁵⁸ Those precedents that raised beggars' First Amendment rights reveal an inconsistent approach to begging regulations.²⁵⁹

In 1976, in Ulmer v. Municipal Court, the California Court of Appeals upheld a statute that prohibited accosting another individual for begging purposes.²⁶⁰ After noting the regulation's purpose as pre-²⁵¹ Id. at 2705-08.

²⁵² Id. at 2709; ISKCON II, 112 S. Ct. at 2710.

²⁵³ See ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. at 2712 (O'Connon, J., concurring); Id. at 2716 (Kennedy, J., concurring); Id. at 2724 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

²⁵⁴ ISKCON I, 112 S. Ct. 2701, 2705 (1992).

²⁵⁵ Id. at 2705-06.

²⁵⁶ See id. at 2705.

²⁵⁷Rose, supra note 13, at 193. One commentator gives four reasons for the "dearth" of precedents: 1) low priority of law enforcement, 2) beggars often lack wherewithal to challenge regulations, 3) long historical roots of anti-begging laws make them more accepted, 4) courts never even address the First Amendment issue. Id. at 193–95.

²⁵⁸ See, e.g., State v. Hundley, 142 S.E. 330, 330–32 (N.D. 1928) (court upheld anti-begging law despite focusing analysis entirely on organized charities); Decker v. Fillis, 306 F. Supp. 613, 614–17 (D. Utah 1969) (law criminalizing loitering/begging invalidated for vagueness and overbreadth without raising the First Amendment).

²⁵⁹ See Rose, supra note 13, at 193.

²⁶⁰ 127 Cal. Rptr. 445, 447 (1st Dist. 1976). The California Penal Code criminalizes "(c) . . . accost[ing] other persons in any public place or in any place open to the public for the purpose of begging or soliciting alms." Cal. Penal. Code § 647 (West Supp. 1993). The petitioner contended that he had been soliciting for "the Son of Man Temple for scientific research on the venting the "annoyance" of begging, the court found no necessary nexus between begging and the communication of ideas.²⁶¹ Consequently, the court concluded that begging was not protected speech.²⁶² The court dismissed a vagueness argument, noting the clear import of the words, "[w]alking up to and approaching another for the purpose of soliciting."²⁶³ The court concluded that the ordinance fell outside the protective sweep of the First Amendment and was constitutional.²⁶⁴

Conversely, in 1984, in C.C.B. v. State of Florida, the First District Court of Appeals of Florida ruled that a Jacksonville municipal ordinance prohibiting begging was unconstitutionally overbroad and violative of the First Amendment.²⁶⁵ First, the court articulated the city's interests in safeguarding against public annoyance and facilitating traffic flow.²⁶⁶ The court reasoned, however, that, balanced against the beggar's rights, these interests did not justify totally depriving the appellant from seeking sustenance through panhandling.²⁶⁷ The court concluded that the ordinance encroached upon the appellant's rights to solicit alms and, therefore, violated the First Amendment.²⁶⁸

Then, in 1990, in Young v. New York City Transit Authority, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that a begging prohibition did not violate freedom of speech.²⁶⁹ Two homeless individuals brought a class action suit challenging a Transit Authority ban on begging in the subway system.²⁷⁰ The court reasoned that the regulation advanced substantial Transit Authority interests without unduly infringing on speech rights.²⁷¹ In dicta, the court questioned disease of sickle-cell anemia," though this was not established on the record. Ulmer, 127 Cal. Rptr. at 447.

²⁶¹ Ulmer, 127 Cal. Rptr. at 447.

²⁶² See id.

 $^{^{268}}$ Id. at 447–48. The court reasoned that the regulation did not include anyone "who merely sits or stands by the wayside." Id.

²⁶⁴ Id. at 447.

 $^{^{265}}$ 458 So.2d 47, 48 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1984). Jacksonville City Ordinance 330.105 made it unlawful "to beg or solicit alms in the streets or public places of the city or exhibit oneself for the purpose of begging or obtaining alms." Id.

²⁶⁶ Id. at 48.

²⁶⁷ See id. at 50. The court distinguished this case from Ulmer, where the statute only dealt with "accosting." Id. at 49.

²⁶⁸ See id. at 48, 50.

²⁶⁹ 903 F.2d 146, 148 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 984 (1990).

²⁷⁰ Id. at 148. The plaintiffs challenged the regulation under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution and challenged a state anti-begging law, N.Y. PENAL LAW § 240.35(1), under the New York State Constitution. Id. at 148, 151. That state law was also challenged in Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, 802 F. Supp. 1029, 1032 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). See infra notes 328–374 and accompanying text for a discussion of Loper.

²⁷¹ See id. at 157-61.

whether begging constituted expressive conduct and determined that the subway constituted a nonpublic forum.²⁷² The court upheld the regulation because it was narrowly tailored to achieve a significant governmental interest, and therefore survived constitutional scrutiny under the track two analysis articulated in O'Brien.²⁷³

To help maintain a safe and effective public transportation system, the Transit Authority had a longstanding prohibition on begging.²⁷⁴ In 1989, the Transit Authority amended the regulation to increase access for organized charities, subject to some location restrictions.²⁷⁵ Simultaneously, the Transit Authority instituted "Operation Enforcement," an attempt to escalate enforcement of the panhandling prohibition.²⁷⁶

In analyzing the panhandling ban, the court first expressed doubts that begging deserved First Amendment protection.²⁷⁷ The court speculated that, under the Spence standard, beggars probably intended no "particularized" message.²⁷⁸ Even assuming a potential message, the court determined that witnesses were unlikely to be able to discern the message.²⁷⁹ Moreover, the court suggested that the inherent aggressiveness of begging in the subway might overshadow any expressive element.²⁸⁰ Finally, the court noted that the only message common in begging, the desire for money, did not coincide with the First Amendment's underlying values.²⁸¹

The court also distinguished begging from charitable solicitation. ²⁸² The court first noted that the Schaumburg trilogy dealt only with the nexus between organized charities' solicitation and various speech interests. ²⁸³ Second, the court emphasized that the Transit Authority was able to distinguish the two when it amended the regulation to

²⁷² Id. at 153-57, 161-62,

 $^{^{273}}$ Id. at 157–61, 164. In addition, the court upheld N.Y. Penal Law § 240.35(1) under the New York State Constitution's Due Process clause. See id. at 164.

²⁷⁴ Young, 903 F.2d at 148. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs., tit. 21, § 1050.6(b) (1989) states: "no person, unless duly authorized . . . shall upon any facility or conveyance . . . solicit alms, subscription or contribution for any purpose."

²⁷⁵ Young, 903 F.2d at 148.

²⁷⁶ Id. at 149. "Operation Enforcement" resulted from a study indicating that begging engendered public intimidation and concern. See id.

²⁷⁷ Id. at 153.

 $^{^{278}}$ ld. The court contrasted begging with clear-cut acts of symbolic conduct. See id. (citing cases).

²⁷⁹ Id. at 153-54.

²⁸⁰ Young, 903 F.2d at 154.

 $^{^{281}}$ See id. The court also separated incidental conversations with subway passengers from begging, the conduct being regulated. See id.

²⁸² Id. at 156.

²⁸³ Id. at 155.

permit access by organized charities.²⁸⁴ Finally, the court emphasized the commonsense difference that organized charities benefitted the community while begging was a "menace to the common good."²⁸⁵ Ultimately, however, the court grounded its decision on an analysis of the regulation, not on whether begging was protected under the First Amendment.²⁸⁶

Assuming that begging fell within the purview of the First Amendment, the court then determined that the regulation withstood scrutiny under the O'Brien standard.287 First, the court noted that the Transit Authority had a substantial interest in providing the general populace with reasonably safe public transportation.²⁸⁸ In the context of the subway, begging threatened that interest because the court viewed it as tantamount to assault. 289 Second, the court determined that the regulation satisfied the content-neutrality prong because the ban attempted to regulate begging's effect on safety and efficiency, not any communicative element.²⁹⁰ Finally, the court determined that the regulation was sufficiently tailored despite being a total ban.²⁹¹ Noting that regulations were not required always to be the least restrictive, the court deferred to the Transit Authority's judgment that controlling the negative effects of begging necessitated a total ban.²⁹² In addition, the court emphasized that the rest of the city remained as an alternative forum, thus mitigating the regulation's effect.293

Although the court did not analyze the regulation under the Public Forum doctrine, in dicta, the court determined that the Transit Authority did not intend to designate the subway a limited public forum.²⁹⁴ The court emphasized that Operation Enforcement actually indicated a contrary intent.²⁹⁵ Furthermore, the court held that the subways could be opened to organized charities without necessarily opening the forum for all conduct.²⁹⁶ The court concluded that the ²⁸⁴ Id. at 155-56. The court emphasized that, while evidence abounded that begging engendered intimidation in passengers, no evidence indicated the same consequences for charitable solicitation. Id. at 156.

²⁸⁵ Young, 903 F.2d at 156.

²⁸⁶ Id. at 154, 161.

²⁸⁷ Id. at 157, 161.

²⁸⁸ Id. at 158.

²⁸⁹ Id.

²⁹⁰ Young, 903 F.2d at 158.

²⁹¹ See id. at 159, 160.

²⁹² Id. at 160.

²⁹⁵ Id.

²⁹⁴ Id. at 161-62.

²⁹⁵ Young, 903 F.2d at 161.

²⁹⁶ Id. at 161-62.

subway qualified as a nonpublic forum and held the regulation to the same level of scrutiny as applied under the O'Brien standard.²⁹⁷

Judge Meskill, concurring in part and dissenting in part, disagreed with the majority's conclusion that the statute did not violate the First Amendment. ²⁹⁸ Judge Meskill perceived no constitutionally meaningful distinction between charitable solicitation and begging, which also furthered the speech interests articulated by the Schaumburg trilogy. ²⁹⁹ He argued that begging should be protected equally by the First Amendment. ³⁰⁰

Next, Judge Meskill determined that the subway was a limited public forum.³⁰¹ He reasoned that by amending the regulation to permit organized charities, the Transit Authority effectively designated the subways as public fora.³⁰² Judge Meskill concluded that the regulation was subject to the stricter scrutiny of a public forum.³⁰³

Finally, Judge Meskill argued that, under strict scrutiny, the Transit Authority's interests did not justify the begging prohibition.³⁰⁴ He emphasized the lack of any distinction between purely passive begging, "which would hardly daunt the average New Yorker," and more aggressively intrusive conduct.³⁰⁵ Conceding the significance of having a safe and efficient subway system, Judge Meskill suggested that, while the Transit Authority might proscribe aggressive behavior or confine soliciting to certain areas, it could not prohibit begging entirely.³⁰⁶ Judge Meskill concluded that the regulation failed to withstand the level of scrutiny accorded speech restrictions in public fora.³⁰⁷

In sum, the Young court held that a ban on begging in the New York subways did not infringe on beggars' freedom of speech. The court reasoned that the Transit Authority's interests in providing efficient public transportation justified the regulation. In addition, the ²⁹⁷ See id.

 $^{^{298}}$ Id. at 164 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part). Judge Meskill concurred with the state law issue, however. Id.

²⁹⁹ Id. at 164 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰⁰ See Young, 903 F.2d at 165 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰¹ Id. at 166 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰² Id. (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰³ See id. at 167 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰⁴ Id. at 167-68 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰⁵ Young, 903 E.2d at 168 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part). Judge Meskill pointed out that there was also no evidence that passengers did not feel harassed when approached by solicitors from organized charities. Id. at 167 n.1, 168.

⁸⁰⁶ Id. at 168 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰⁷ Id. at 167-68 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

³⁰⁸ Id. at 164.

³⁰⁹ Id. at 158.

court suggested that begging did not constitute protectable speech and that the subways were not public for ssuch that the regulation should be given greater scrutiny. Therefore, the Young court concluded that the regulation should stand. 511

Conversely, in 1991, in Blair v. Shanahan, the United States District Court for the Northern District of California held a state prohibition of begging unconstitutional. A former panhandler sought recompense for damages suffered from police enforcement of the ban. The court diverged from the Young decision and drew a parallel between the speech interests involved in begging and those present in charitable solicitation. The court concluded that the statute violated the First Amendment.

The Blair court found no significant First Amendment distinction between begging and solicitation by organized charities.³¹⁶ The court reasoned that begging promoted the same speech values because, more than a mere commercial exchange, beggars disseminate information on their situation and poverty in general.³¹⁷ The court stressed that constitutional protection continues even though beggars represent only themselves and intend to keep the receipts.³¹⁸

In so concluding, the court declined to follow the Young decision.³¹⁹ The court noted that factual differences between the subway and the street might reconcile the two decisions, but refused to take this path.³²⁰ Moreover, the court described as "disturbing," the Young court's characterization of begging as "a menace to the common good."³²¹

Reasoning that the prohibition affected a public forum, the street, the court then strictly scrutinized the state's interests in prohibiting begging. 322 First, the court dismissed as uncompelling the idea that the statute prevented public annoyance. 523 Second, the court determined

```
310 Young, 903 F.2d at 153, 162.
```

³¹¹ Id. at 164.

^{312 775} F. Supp. 1315, 1329 (N.D. Cal. 1991).

³¹³ Id. at 1317.

³¹⁴ See id. at 1322-23.

³¹⁵ See id. at 1325.

³¹⁶ Id. at 1322.

³¹⁷ Blair, 775 F. Supp. at 1322-23.

 $^{^{318}}$ Id. at 1323. The court analogized the beggar to a professional fundraiser whose primary goal is to effectuate monetary donations. See id. at 1323–24.

³¹⁹ Id. at 1323.

³²⁰ See id. at 1322 & n.5.

³²¹ Id. at 1323 n.9.

³²² See Blair, 775 F. Supp. at 1324.

⁵²⁵ Id. But see Ulmer, 127 Cal. Rptr. at 447–48 (finding purpose behind statute supported enforcement).

that preventing intrusion on the public at large also failed to be compelling.³²⁴ Finally, the court conceded that while preventing "coercive" or "intimidating" activity was compelling, the statute at issue was not sufficiently narrowly drawn to serve that interest.³²⁵ The court emphasized that existing laws already protected the public from such threatening conduct.³²⁶ Thus, the court struck down the statute as violative of the First Amendment.³²⁷

Following in the wake of Blair, in October 1992, in Loper v. New York City Police Department, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York struck down a New York City ordinance criminalizing begging. Two homeless individuals challenged the statute in a class action suit, claiming violations of the First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Under the First Amendment analysis, the court first noted that begging was protected speech, and then determined that the beggars' rights outweighed competing interests. The court concluded that the regulation failed to withstand First Amendment scrutiny.

The New York City Police Department used the criminal begging law to justify organized campaigns to reduce begging. The police argued that allowing the persistence of minor forms of disorder, such as begging or broken windows, fosters more serious crime by undermining the public sense of order. Under this "Broken Windows" theory, the police attempted to combat crime by reasserting an orderly society. On the other hand, the homeless plaintiffs depended on begging as their sole means of support. Although never arrested or summonsed, the plaintiffs had been occasionally ordered by the police to "move along," under threat of the regulation.

³²⁴ Blair, 775 F. Supp. at 1324.

³²⁵ Id.

³²⁶ Id.

³²⁷ See id. at 1325.

³²⁸802 F. Supp. 1029, 1048 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). N.Y. Penal Law § 240.35(1) stated in pertinent part: "A person is guilty of loitering when he: 1. Loiters, remains or wanders about in a public place for the purpose of begging. . . ." See supra note 273 for the Young court's disposition of this statute under the New York State Constitution.

³²⁹ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1033. The court did not deal with the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because it decided on First Amendment grounds. Id. at 1047-48.

⁵³⁰ See id. at 1036-37, 1047.

³³¹ Id. at 1047.

⁸⁸² Id. at 1034.

³³³ See id.

³³⁴ See Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1034; see also infra notes 378-388 for a discussion of the Broken Windows theory.

³⁸⁵ Id. at 1033.

³³⁶ Id.

The court began by analogizing begging to sankirtan, the Krishna ritual of in-person solicitation held to be protected speech in ISK-CON.³⁸⁷ Dismissing the differences between begging and solicitation by organized charities as "largely semantic," the court reasoned that the two activities conveyed identical messages.³⁸⁸ The court noted that attempting to disentangle the expressive element from conduct would be futile in this instance.³⁸⁹ The court concluded that begging fell within the scope of the First Amendment.³⁴⁰

Next, the court examined whether the statute could survive constitutional scrutiny.³⁴¹ The court first determined that the statute was content-based because it targeted the beggars' message.³⁴² The court emphasized the disparate treatment accorded solicitors for organized charities and beggars "standing side-by-side" despite identical messages.³⁴³ According to the court, the Broken Windows rationale only highlighted the fact that the regulation targeted begging's societal message.³⁴⁴ The court concluded that the regulation was not content-neutral and deserved strict scrutiny.³⁴⁵

Under a strict scrutiny analysis, the Loper court faulted the total ban, for effectively closing all alternatives.³⁴⁶ The court emphasized that other New York laws already addressed problem conduct.³⁴⁷ The court concluded that the regulation was not narrowly tailored to advance a city interest.³⁴⁸

³³⁷ Id. at 1037. The court even noted that sankirtan can be "more aggressive and intrusive" than begging, Id.

³³⁸ Id. at 1037-38 ("[i]t is the message that is the same, and that message is entitled to First Amendment protection.") (citing First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777 (1978) (source of speech does not define inherent worth in terms of capacity to inform)).

⁵³⁹ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1038.

³⁴⁰ See id.

³⁴¹ See id. Synthesizing the O'Brien test and the standard for reasonable regulation of time, place or manner of expression, the court articulated three requirements for constitutional regulations. Id. at 1039. First, a regulation must be content-neutral. Id. Second, it must be supported by substantial governmental interest. Id. Third, the regulation must allow alternative means of communication. Id. The court addressed the first and third requirements before addressing the second. See id. at 1039–41.

³⁴² See id. at 1040.

⁸⁴⁸ Id. Organized charities are subject to a New York licensing scheme. Id. The court also pointed out that, of all the visual and aural intrusions on individual tranquility along Times Square, only the beggar is singled out for regulation. Id.

³⁴⁴ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1040.

³⁴⁵ See id.

³⁴⁶ Id.

³⁴⁷ Id. at 1040-41.

³⁴⁸ See id.

Next, the court balanced the government's interests underpinning the statute against the beggars' freedom of speech interests.³⁴⁹ The court defined the government's interest as protecting and promoting three factors: the beggars' interests, the specific audience's interests and the general public's interests.³⁵⁰

The Loper court first determined the beggars' interests in this case to be the widest possible dissemination of two related messages.³⁵¹ First, the court noted that the beggars wanted to indicate their specific dire economic plight and request donations.³⁵² Second, and more generally, the court observed that the beggars expressed the underside of current socio-economic conditions.³⁵⁸

The court viewed the audience's interests as having information readily available to it, being informed about social conditions, not being defrauded, and having one's personal privacy respected. The though it considered begging readily compatible with the first two interests, the court struggled with the degree to which speech must bow to privacy concerns. The court noted that exposure to differing messages was in the audience's best interests even if "in unwelcome forms. The court reasoned that outside the home, individuals sacrifice their privacy rights to the greater societal interest in permitting the expression. The court then emphasized the degree of control that pedestrians possess in determining whether they become an "audience" to the beggar's plea. The court concluded that, although close, the beggars' interests ultimately outweighed those of the specific audience.

Finally, the court explored the general interests of the public in upholding the public order and preventing fraud.³⁶⁰ The court divided

```
549 Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1047.
```

³⁵⁰ Id. at 1042.

³⁵¹ See id.

⁸⁵² Id.

⁸⁵⁸ Id.

⁸⁵⁴ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1042.

³⁵⁵ See id. at 1042-43.

³⁵⁶ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1042-43.

³⁵⁷ See id. at 1047.

^{*558} Id. at 1045. "He can turn away, shake his head before the expression is uttered, avert his eyes and refuse to acknowledge the speaker, or he can listen to the message and then decide how to respond to the speaker's personal appeal." Id.

³⁵⁹ Id.

³⁶⁰ See id. at 1045-47. See infra notes 368-371 and accompanying text for a discussion of prevention of fraud.

society's interest in the public order into two aspects, the prohibition of disruptive conduct and the Broken Windows rationale.³⁶¹ If intended to combat disruptive behavior, such as aggressive panhandling or interference with traffic, the court concluded that the statute was overbroad.³⁶² According to the Loper court, existing laws already addressed these problems and laws narrowly targeting undesirable activity would have been a more effective solution than the blanket ban.³⁶³

Furthermore, the court declined to endorse the Broken Windows justification for the panhandling ban. The court noted that, even accepting the theory, beggars themselves do not constitute a threat and have committed only "the offense of being needy. The court reasoned that this justification merely removes "the messenger of bad news" from sight. The Loper court rejected the Broken Windows rationale, asserting that speech should not lose First Amendment protection simply because society finds it disturbing. The Broken Windows is the state of the broken windows rationale, asserting that speech should not lose First Amendment protection simply because society finds it disturbing.

The court also dismissed the public's interest in prevention of fraud as a justification for the ban. ⁵⁶⁸ The court first reasoned that the fact that organized charities provide some relief does not abrogate the beggars' right to take matters into their own hands. ⁵⁶⁹ Second, the vague possibility that the donated alms will not be used for the announced purposes could not support a blanket ban on panhandling. ³⁷⁰ The court concluded that the city's interests in banning begging failed to overcome beggars' free speech rights. ³⁷¹

In sum, after concluding that begging deserved First Amendment protection, the Loper court reasoned that the regulation directly targeted begging's message, and that the total ban eliminated alternative ⁵⁶¹ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1045.

³⁶² Id.

³⁶³ Id. at 1045, 1046.

³⁶⁴ See id. at 1046.

⁵⁰⁵ Id.

³⁶⁶ Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1046.

³⁶⁷ See id. The court also dismissed the argument that the statute was constitutional because the police do not enforce it on the peaceful beggar; this would mean that overly broad discretion was delegated to the decision maker. Id.

 $^{^{868}}$ Id. at 1046–47. The court noted that this argument has often failed in the context of charitable solicitation. Id. at 1046.

³⁶⁹ See id. at 1047 (noting that available services do not meet the great need presented); but see Williams, supra note 2 ("but [Detroit Salvation Army] Colonel Clarence Harvey says there's enough food and shelter available right now that the homeless don't need to beg.").

⁵⁷⁰ See Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1047. The general fear seems to be that the money will be spent on "more self-destructive ends, such as the purchase of tobacco, alcohol or drugs." Id. at 1046.

³⁷¹ Id. at 1047.

³⁷² Id. at 1037-38, 1040.

forums.³⁷² Moreover, the court determined that the city's asserted interests were not compelling enough to override beggars' rights.³⁷³ Therefore, the court held that the prohibition of begging on New York City streets did not withstand First Amendment scrutiny.³⁷⁴

Thus, courts have treated beggars' First Amendment rights inconsistently. The Ulmer and Young courts determined that societal interests in preventing begging outweighed any free speech interests of the beggar. Conversely, the C.C.B., Blair and Loper courts held that the First Amendment prohibited obstructing beggars' expressing their message of life in the underclass. The speech interests of the speech interests of the speech interests of the beggar. The speech interests of the beggars of life in the underclass.

VI. APPLICATION OF THE PUBLIC FORUM DOCTRINE TO ANTI-BEGGING LAWS

A. Sociological Views on Begging

Some commentators advocate anti-begging laws as a means for reasserting control over our decaying urban environment and halting the dissolution of our social fabric.³⁷⁸ The Broken Windows theory contends that low-level disorder, if left unchecked, leads to more serious crime and the breakdown of the social order.³⁷⁹ The presence of unfixed broken windows, graffiti or panhandling in a neighborhood creates the impression that the authorities have lost control.³⁸⁰ The community grows increasingly atomized as people modify their behavior to fit their perceptions.³⁸¹ Many will simply leave or at least avoid "unsafe" areas.³⁸² The theory deems such neighborhoods ripe for criminal invasion.³⁸³ Drug dealers, prostitutes and other criminals will then enter the scene, believing themselves more secure from police interference.³⁸⁴ One author describing this phenomenon stated that ³⁷³ Id. at 1047.

³⁷⁴ Id. at 1048.

³⁷⁵ See, e.g., Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 903 F.2d 146, 147 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 984 (1990); Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, 802 F. Supp. 1029, 1048 (S.D.N.Y. 1992); Blair v. Shanahan, 775 F. Supp. 1315, 1329 (N.D. Cal. 1991); C.C.B. v. Florida, 458 So.2d 47, 48 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1984); Ulmer v. Municipal Court, 127 Cal. Rptr. 445, 447 (Cal. Ct. App. 1976).

⁵⁷⁶ See Young, 903 F.2d at 147; Ulmer, 127 Cal. Rptr. at 447.

³⁷⁷ See Loper, 802 F. Supp. at 1048; Blair, 775 F. Supp. at 1329; C.C.B., 458 So.2d at 48.

³⁷⁸ See Rightsmongering, supra note 6, at 23; Wilson & Kelling, supra note 6, at 35.

^{$79} Fighting, supra note 6, at 18; Rightsmongering, supra note 6, at 23; see also Wilson & Kelling, supra note 6, at 31-32.

³⁸⁰ Fighting, supra note 6, at 18; Rightsmongering, supra note 6, at 23.

³⁸¹ Wilson & Kelling, supra note 6, at 32.

 $^{^{382}}$ Id.

³⁸³ Id.

³⁸⁴ Id.

"[w] hen the police were withdrawn from the neighborhoods and the social workers pulled out of the projects, skid row behavior and a sense of menace extended outward to include larger and larger portions of the city."385

The social order rests upon a myriad of small, mundane interchanges, scenes and images; when these show signs of disrepair, the structure of our society risks collapse. 386 These commentators argue that by enforcing laws against begging, cities can reimpose order on the sidewalks and in the neighborhoods.³⁸⁷ By constructing such a background, these cities are setting the stage for the reversal of urban deterioration.388

Other commentators view begging and its relation to the social fabric radically differently.³⁸⁹ These commentators view the vaunted social structure built upon a myriad of background details as a fragile illusion, "phantom normalcy," erected as psychological insulation against the harshness of reality.³⁹⁰ In return for hiding the "pain of being poor," beggars receive society's tacit "phantom acceptance"—or at least not its explicit rejection.³⁹¹ The listeners can remain unshaken in their feelings of physical security as well as their naivete over economic reality.392

Begging provides a means for the disenfranchised to break through the "phantom" wall.393 This engagement value of begging allows beggars to bridge the psychological divide and establish, if only momentarily, a social bond with an individual in the mainstream. 994 At that precise moment, the listener cannot avoid confronting the reality of poverty in our midst. 395 Theorists contend that these small connec-

³⁸⁵ Fred Siegel, Reclaiming Our Public Spaces, The CITY JOURNAL, Spring 1992, at 35, 37. 386 Siegel, supra note 385, at 35.

[[]S]sidewalk contacts are the small change from which a city's wealth of public life may grow. . . . The tolerance, the room for great differences among neighbors, are possible and normal only when the streets of great cities have built-in equipment allowing strangers to dwell in peace together on civilized but essentially dignified and reserved terms.

Siegel, supra note 385, at 35 quoting Jane Jacobs, The Death and Life of Great American CITIES (1961).

³⁸⁷ See Rightsmongering, supra note 6, at 23.

³⁸⁸ See James Q. Wilson & George L. Kelling, Making Neighborhoods Safe, The ATLANTIC MONTHLY, Feb. 1989, at 46 (citing examples of instances in which theory has apparently worked).

³⁸⁹ See Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 910.

⁸⁹⁰ See id. at 912.

³⁹¹ Id.

³⁹² Id.

³⁹³ Id. at 912-913.

³⁹⁴ Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 913.

³⁹⁵ Id. at 912.

tions between individuals will form the "small change" from which a society can develop, based not in phantom but human realities. ³⁹⁶ Not only does such engagement allow the beggar to assert his or her humanity and "escape momentarily, [his or] her marginalization," it also fosters empathy in the listener and appeals to the listener's sense of social justice. ³⁹⁷ At a minimum, such an engagement reminds those who would prefer to remain shrouded in the naivete of "phantom normalcy . . . of the human costs of poverty." Thus, under this view, begging performs a social function closely linked to the First Amendment itself by exposing the true nature of society, even if a bit unseemly. The uncomfortable nature of begging, while making it controversial, is therefore seen as precisely that which makes it deserving of First Amendment protection.

B. Begging Constitutes Protected Expression

Despite its prominent place in the deterioration of cities, begging deserves First Amendment protection as expressive activity. An examination of begging, Supreme Court precedents dealing with charitable solicitation, and the values underpinning the First Amendment reveals that begging falls within the First Amendment's intended scope of expressive freedom. Yet, begging does, sometimes, conflict with the public order or inconvenience more mundane concerns, such as commuting. Focusing too much on the definition of speech risks detracting from the pursuit of a society committed to expressive freedom, as well as overlooking the gravity of the community's interests. Evaluating begging restrictions via a Public Forum analysis enables the courts to strike a balance between beggars' expressive rights and communitarian interests. By using a conception of the doctrine such as Justice Kennedy's in ISKCON III, one that focuses on the physical nature and uses of fora, the courts can best maintain diverse voices while not overlooking general societal interests. 399

1. Begging Conveys a Message

An examination of begging reveals that it conveys a powerful message about the economic underside of our society and, thus should be protected by the First Amendment. By forcing the listener to con-

³⁹⁶ See id. at 915.

³⁹⁷ Id. at 914.

⁸⁹⁸ See id.

³⁹⁹ See ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. 2711, 2716 (1992) (Kennedy, J., concurring).

front the reality of poverty, begging does express an unmistakable message. In dicta, the Young court wrongly applied the Spence standard, which defines speech as acts intended to convey a particularized message easily discernible by its audience, to determine that begging did not constitute speech. The message ascertained by the Young court, "that beggars . . . want money," necessarily implies two points. First, the beggar is poor, which highlights the existence of extreme poverty and its nature. Second, the beggar believes that he or she can elicit alms from passers-by for survival, implying social obligations owed by members of society to one another. Concededly, the message of begging is difficult to distill into a short phrase common to all beggars. At the expense of clear articulation, however, begging conveys its message in a manner calculated to carry a great degree of empathic force. The First Amendment aims to promote ideas, not simply words, and does not discriminate against the "inexpressible emotions" often captured in art or conduct. 400 Thus, viewed as an expression of poverty and social responsibility, begging expresses a coherent idea in a powerful manner.

In addition, the beggar's audience can comprehend the message, the second requirement of the Spence standard. The rationales asserted by the Transit Authority in Young and the police in Loper, show that begging is targeted because the audience perceives its message. ⁴⁰¹ The Broken Windows thesis advocates eliminating begging because it exposes cracks in the public order, demonstrating that society is not in full control. This theory warns that allowing this reality to become widely known will accelerate societal deterioration, exemplified by urban decay. Therefore, the theory presumes that the general public perceives the import of begging's message and responds accordingly. This conclusion is reinforced by indications that the presence of beggars engenders fear and uneasiness in members of the public, such as the Transit Authority study emphasized in Young. ⁴⁰² The reaction of passers-by can only be the result of their understanding the message, complete with its large emotional aspect.

2. Begging is Equivalent to Charitable Solicitation

Furthermore, no meaningful distinction can be drawn between begging and solicitation by organized charities, which the Supreme

 $^{^{400}}$ See supra notes 89–109 and accompanying text for a discussion of First Amendment values

⁴⁰¹ Young v. New York City Transit Auth., 903 F.2d 146, 149 (2d Cir. 1990); Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, 802 F. Supp. 1029, 1034 (S.D.N.Y. 1992).

⁴⁰² See supra note 276.

Court held protectable in the Schaumburg trilogy. Absent connotations from their respective labels, both activities involve in-person solicitation of immediate payment for financial support. No less than charitable solicitation, the act of begging is intertwined with the substantial speech interests articulated in Schaumburg. Begging communicates information regarding the speaker's plight and spreads views on how our society treats its disenfranchised. 403 Begging also advocates social responsibility by communicating that society should support and help out the downtrodden and less fortunate. 404 Similarly, the ability of beggars to continue to speak depends no less on the donation of funds than does the ability of organized groups such as the Krishna society. The Schaumburg trilogy also demonstrates that begging cannot be distinguished on the grounds that the beggars retain the money for personal use. The Riley Court explicitly noted that the speech of professional fundraisers is protected despite the fact that they are being compensated.405

3. Begging Advances the First Amendment's Values

Extending protection to begging as speech also advances the values underlying the First Amendment. Each of the theories articulated by commentators highlights a benefit to society from maximizing the opportunity to express ideas. Protecting begging expands the opportunity to a largely disenfranchised class of citizens through nontraditional modes of expression.

In addition, begging advances the Marketplace of Ideas theory by challenging preconceptions of poverty, especially by shattering carefully constructed illusions of "order." Begging also challenges views on communal responsibility by implicitly advocating a duty to help the poor and providing an alternative to traditional charities. Whether one agrees with the beggar's message is irrelevant, for the Marketplace theory contends that truth will only emerge from open and uninhibited debate.

Moreover, begging furthers the Democratic Process theory in two primary ways. First, allowing begging to exist in open sight allows citizens to realize the full magnitude of socio-economic conditions. This theory contends that enlightened public policy can only result when the citizenry enjoys a full understanding of the issues. If begging ⁴⁰³ Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 905.

⁴⁰⁴ Id.

⁴⁰⁵ See supra note 192 and accompanying text.

could be swept up and hidden away, then citizens might fall prey to an illusion of normalcy, and not truly comprehend that there was a serious public issue at all. Second, begging may be the only means of access, albeit indirect, to public policy formation left for the poor on the fringes of society.

Finally, begging also furthers the Self-Realization value of freedom of speech. So long as it does not cross the line into aggressive "panhassling," begging provides an outlet for beggars to express their opinions and disseminate their values. Even broader than merely a point of access to public policy, begging links the indigent to the mainstream. These momentary escapes from marginalization provide the beggar's only opportunity for expressing his or her "inner spirit."

Thus, an investigation of begging's message, the Supreme Court's holdings on charitable solicitation, and the values underlying freedom of speech, demonstrates that begging fits within the intended scope of the First Amendment. Although often accompanied by explanations, opinions or words of various sorts, the totality of begging deserves protection, not simply incidental conversations as argued by Judge Meskill in his Young dissent. 407 Organized charities convey their message, regardless of whether they give a full explanation of the cause to every potential donor. Likewise, beggars convey their message through panhandling, and artificial distinctions between those commenting on President Clinton's tax policies and those simply extending a paper cup should not be used to delimit First Amendment protection.

C. The Public Forum Doctrine

Beggars' activities nevertheless conflict with other interests of the community. For example, beggars in the subways do hinder the most efficient operation of mass transportation and affect congestion. Begging also contravenes the maintenance of a general sense of order and safety sought by government authorities. Although the First Amendment has never been costless, the Supreme Court has recognized that freedom of speech must be balanced against competing interests. Therefore, the courts' challenge is to develop a standard of review for begging regulations that will enable them to strike the appropriate balance.

A heavy focus on what qualifies as speech risks detracting from the task of devising appropriate balances. While defining protectable speech serves a necessary threshold function, the preferred position of expressive freedom suggests a broad scope of protected expression. The First Amendment's underpinning theories all emphasize the benefits from maximizing the pool of potential speakers and ideas. An approach that merely stops with a determination of "speech," and accords absolute protection, is inadequate. First, such an approach forces the courts to make final decisions on which voices will be heard and creates a substantial risk of narrowing the range of speech to exclude the less mainstream voices. Second, such an approach ignores the infinite variety of ideas and methods of transmission. Some expressive acts may simply impose too high a cost on the rest of society, while the same conduct or message in a different form, may be perfectly compatible when placed in different surroundings. The courts should make an initial determination that a message is probably conveyed, within broad parameters, and then focus on accommodating the multiplicity of voices and interests.

⁴⁰⁶ Hershkoff & Cohen, supra note 41, at 903.

⁴⁰⁷ Young, 903 F.2d at 166 (Meskill, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part).

Begging exemplifies a form of expression that wreaks havoc with First Amendment analysis. By mixing conduct and speech into an inseparable mass of expression, begging operates interactively with society and therefore inevitably comes into conflict with competing forces, such as traffic. In addition, begging's association in many people's minds with the uglier side of life engenders strong reactions against both the message and the messenger. Any analytical approach to begging restrictions must possess two important qualities. First, the doctrine must be flexible enough to reconcile the inevitable conflicts with other societal goals. Second, the doctrine must be able to withstand the tide of popular repulsion, to protect begging when necessary.

The Public Forum doctrine provides a ready framework to deal with forms of expression like begging. First, it aims at developing a sort of New Roberts Rules of Order, for accommodating as much speech as possible without frustrating the forum's primary purpose. 408 Second, using Justice Kennedy's view of the doctrine, which places heavier emphasis on objective criteria, would insulate the analysis somewhat from the effect of popular reaction that can easily influence the government's rules and asserted interests. 409 The courts should focus on the three factors articulated by Justice Kennedy in his ISKCON concurrence when evaluating begging restrictions: the property's shared physical similarities with traditional public fora, whether the government has permitted broad public access to the property and whether ⁴⁰⁸ Kalven, supra note 41, at 13.

⁴⁰⁹ See ISKCON III, 112 S. Ct. 2711, 2716 (1992) (Kennedy, J., concurring).

expressive activity would interfere in a significant way with the uses of the property. 410

The Loper and Blair courts correctly struck down anti-begging ordinances because they operated in areas that were clearly public fora. City streets have been described as quintessential public fora, that "time out of mind" have been used for the purpose of expression. History alone, however, should not be dispositive. The Supreme Court has indicated that, in spite of tradition, sidewalks are not always public fora. Thus, certain areas may present examples of fora where beggars' speech rights can justifiably be limited; for instance, a narrow choke point or within thirty feet of an automatic teller machine. The Young court, however, disregarded the possibility that new fora develop to replace old gathering places for citizens. If free speech coexisted with mass transportation at train and bus terminals in earlier times, then the two can likely coexist in modern subway stations.

V. Conclusion

Restrictions on beggars' free speech rights can best be reviewed under the Public Forum doctrine. Begging should be considered an exercise of free speech because it fits within the intended scope of the First Amendment and is analogous to charitable solicitation. Moreover, protecting begging advances the First Amendment's underlying values. The nature of begging, however, creates an unavoidable risk of conflict with other elements of society. Yet, the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech has never been costless, and begging should be protected from regulation as much as possible. The Public Forum doctrine serves this purpose by explicitly varying the degree of scrutiny for restrictions with the surrounding context, and by making its determination of forum status on the basis of objective criteria. Therefore, the Public Forum doctrine provides the analytical approach best suited to dealing with ambiguous forms of expression such as begging.

John T. Haggerty

⁴¹⁰ Id. at 2718 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

⁴¹¹ Hague v. Committee for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 515 (1939).

⁴¹² See United States v. Kokinda, 110 S. Ct. 3115, 3120 (1990) (sidewalk running only from parking lot to U.S. Post Office).