Appendix 2: 1977 Hayward Annual - Press Reviews and Letters

1. Richard Cork

In promoting themselves and their friends with such astonishing thoroughness, they are simply carrying out the brief which the Arts Council expected them to fulfil...and in the event of such a policy continuing we must ask who selects the selectors and what kind of interests do they represent?...it is a fact that all three men stand, in their various ways for the British modern art establishment. Hodgkin and Turnbull both show at the Waddington and Tooth Galleries, now the most powerful dealer in British art and a conglomerate which seems to be expanding its Empire all the time...as many as 15 artists included in Part One are permanently attached to Waddington and Tooth's, and two of the others have shown with the Waddington and Tooth premises...the impression of a shop window for one London dealer.<sup>2</sup>

2. Paul Overy

Inclusion in the Hayward seems to depend on whether you are doing something similar to what you were doing in the Sixties, but in a smoother, more sophisticated way. Most of the artists at the Hayward made their names in the early sixties. Most of them show at the Waddington and Tooth gallery and most of them have had shows there over the past year or so, often of the same or very similar work as is included at the Hayward. What is the point of displaying this all over again?...why fill precious space for the whole of the summer with what could be seen in Cork Street? British art gets enough airing in London. What we need to see is a much more varied selection of work from abroad.<sup>3</sup>

3. Caroline Tisdall

Much of the show looked like a museum-scale plug for the stable of artists attached to one powerful West End dealer, Leslie Waddington... himself a champion thoroughbred in that stable, Hoyland pointed out that each of the Annual's two parts continues "far longer than a normal gallery showing period, the aim being to allow the work to be seen by large numbers of people passing through London at this time of year, a public who might not normally see or have access to the smaller galleries." John Hoyland apparently labours under the complacent delusion that the way to make establishment modernism popular in this country is simply to transport it from Bond Street to a bigger venue. Perhaps Part One's turnout will force him to think again, and realise that contemporary art's relationship with the public is now far too diseased for any superficial panacea to cope with moving the afflicted to a more prominent hospital is hardly calculated to cure their ailment outright.<sup>4</sup>

The Hayward show, with many of the same artists (as included in the Tate 'Artists of the Sixties' exhibition) defies trade descriptions by claiming to be current British art. In fact the mental space it works in is somewhere around 1965 and the 1965 Show is what it is rudely being called...so why have we been flung back to the jolly time when art was jolly and pop and there was no shortage of cotton duck for large, large paintings. Nostalgia is the most innocent reason. The sixties were the prime time for the generation that now rule the roost through established reputations and Establishment positions...so in cultural terms we are apparently celebrating the joint monarchy of painting and sculpture before anyone started questioning their exclusivity of reign...playing safe makes for smooth careers and kills cultural life.<sup>5</sup>

4. Peter Blake

My main objection to your article is that you, all three, waste most of your space on 'art politics'. Caroline Tisdall while doing so, is critical of the introduction to the catalogue...she hardly mentions the art in the exhibition herself, and I don't think there is one positive remark on the work in it, in her review.

You also point out that many of the exhibitors are with the Waddington and Tooth Galleries. At the moment this gallery is the largest in London, with a number of the best painters and sculptors in this country, so it would seem logical that a high percentage of the artists in the show might be with the gallery.

All three of you make a point of the fact that most of the artists in the show were working in the 'sixties'. Anyone who is likely to be in this exhibition, is also very likely to have worked during the 'sixties' and won't have stopped working as the 'seventies' began but developed and hopefully become better and more mature artists.

Some of the other critics have said how poorly attended this exhibition has been, if this is really so, you must take part of the blame, because of your negative approach to reviewing it.

Richard Cork calls his review 'This Charmed Circle'. If this means that the artists in the show form a 'Charmed Circle' this would seem not to be so. The range of artists in the two parts of the exhibition couldn't be much more diverse, and no circle however 'charmed' could contain us all...I wish you would look at the work and review it.<sup>6</sup>

5. Patrick Heron

I'm pleased to see Tisdall, Overy and Cork catching it at last from the painters. These three critics have done their level best for years to belittle the achievement of living British painters. But now that the idea that British painting is good is no longer a chauvinistic heresy (I published 'The Ascendancy of London in the Sixties', in Studio International in 1966 to the accompaniment of screams of derision) may I enlarge on Peter Blake's point that painters now identified with the Sixties are still working away in 'the seventies'? Quite so.

6. Paul Overy

In "An open letter to three critics" (Caroline Tisdall, Richard Cork, and myself) which is framed as one of his exhibits at the Hayward Annual Part Two, Peter Blake writes: "Anyone who is likely to be in the exhibition, is also very likely to have worked during the 'sixties', and won't have stopped working as the 'seventies' began, but developed and hopefully become better and more mature artists." What is sad is that, however "hopefully", the great majority of the artists in both parts of the Hayward show have not become better and more mature artists. There were two notable exceptions in the first part. Now over 70, Kenneth Martin, who has only recently returned to painting in any quantity after many years making mobiles and constructions, exhibited a series of paintings and drawings which left not a shadow of doubt that he is working better than ever before and that he must be reckoned as one of the best painters of his generation anywhere...Frank Auerbach also showed some works which demonstrated that although he has pursued a single-minded path of expressive figuration, he has of recently developed in a new and exceptionally way. These, too, were paintings which bear comparison with the best work produced in Europe or America.

Contrary to what some correspondents have suggested in their letters to The Guardian (where Blake's open letter was reprinted) responsible critics are not "enemies of painting" although they may well believe the patient is sick. That there still remain possibilities for the medium was triumphantly demonstrated by the contribution of Martin and Auerbach. Two other artists (neither of them a painter), John Latham, the first part of the show, and Stuart Brisley, in the second, also reveal that they have not marked time since the Sixties or – as in the case with so many of the other artists- become repetitive, self-parodying, or gone into decline. Latham in his fifties and Brisley in his forties are both artists who work in an area which is between painting and sculpture. They are known internationally but are not particularly familiar to the English public, far less so than painters like Blake and Hockney. Neither they nor Martin or Auerbach have ever received the kind of publicity and puffery recently accorded R.B. Kitaj...the performance of Hockney, Blake and Kitaj...can only be described as dismal.<sup>7</sup>

Collective statement by the selector (Richard Cork) and exhibitors

1. WE are increasingly dissatisfied with the failure of so much contemporary art to communicate with anyone outside a small circle of initiates.
2. WE believe too many artists are content with the public's view that modern art only fulfils a minor function within society.
3. WE refuse to accept that art today must inevitably be regarded as a marginal, mercantile and misunderstood activity, alienated from most members of its potential audience.
4. WE are convinced that art must be transformed into a progressive force for change in the future.
5. WE consider that the artist ought to engage with as many of the working people who think art has nothing to do with them.
6. WE insist that art should have everything to do with them, because it cannot sustain itself without a central involvement with the life we all live now.
7. WE want artists to help create an egalitarian society by developing new ways of reaching towards the many rather than the few.
8. WE maintain that artists should become responsive to the broadly-based contexts in which they must operate, because most people rightly recoil from attempts to impose on them an art they do not want.
9. WE would like society to regard artists as having an active part to play in dealing with the human, social and political issues which affect everyone's existence.
10. WE declare that art needs people as much as people need art: the two should be inextricably linked with each other, and never divorced so damagingly again.

Gillian Ayres

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Gillian Ayres was born in 1930 and studied at Camberwell School of Art. Soon after graduating she started to forge a career, coming to prominence in the late Fifties. Her first solo exhibition was with Gallery One in 1956, followed by inclusion in seminal group exhibitions, including the 1960 Situation exhibition, which helped to establish her reputation. Another development that assisted with the development of her early career was the invitation in 1957 by South Hampstead High School to paint a mural for its dining room, which took two years to complete.

Throughout the Sixties she showed with the Molton and Kasmin Galleries<sup>19</sup> and enjoyed a modicum of success. In 1962 the art critic for The Times referred to her as 'an adventurist colourist... her colour is adventurous and joyous'.<sup>20</sup> But the situation soon changed and throughout the Seventies she was without major gallery representation and this impacted negatively on her career. During this time she divided her time between motherhood and full-time teaching. However, her work continued to receive praise.<sup>21</sup> In 1982 she was taken up by London's Knoedler Gallery. There are fifty-one works by Ayres in UK public collections<sup>22</sup> but only eleven works were acquired between 1957 and 1979, the rest, mainly paintings post-1980, entered the collections much later.<sup>23</sup> This can be attributed partly to her 'late flowering', partly to the gallery representation she enjoyed in her later

Bernard Cohen

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Born in 1933, Bernard Cohen trained at St Martins School of Art and the Slade School of Art in the early 1950s. The early influence on his work was Jackson Pollock. He first exhibited in the early Fifties and was included in the 1960 Situation exhibition; although in recent years he has underplayed its significance.<sup>26</sup> His shows with the Kasmin Gallery in the early Sixties consolidated his reputation and his career developed accordingly. His work was included in a number of solo and group exhibitions. These shows attracted critical attention from the media and his work was commended by, among others, James Faure-Walker, Edward Lucie-Smith,

<sup>26</sup> In an interview with Ian McKay, he claimed, 'No one looked at the Situation exhibition.. the exhibition got no more than thirty visitors a day. There may be plenty of people who tell you they saw it, but when the show closed, there was a deficit of about sixty or seventy quid – it was reviewed badly by one or two people, but hardly anyone saw it or cared about it. If it is revered, then I'm utterly astonished. If it has become part of art history, I'm equally surprised... The idea that there was this thing going on in English painting is not at all true'. McKay, I. 'The Art and Times of Bernard Cohen' Issue Nine [Online] <http://discreet-uk.com/state-of-art/ISSUE%20NINE/MCKAY-9.html> [20 May 2015]

Norbert Lynton, Ian McKay, John Russell, and Norbert Lynton.<sup>27</sup> In 1966 he was one of five artists<sup>28</sup> invited to represent Britain at the Venice Biennale. He submitted nine paintings.<sup>29</sup> The critic Norbert Lynton stated that Cohen's room in the British Pavilion was 'unforgettable'.<sup>30</sup>

After his success in Venice the highlight of his career was the major retrospective of his paintings and drawings held at the Hayward Gallery in 1972; the Tate Gallery's Assistant Keeper of Paintings, Richard Morphet wrote the catalogue entry. He is well-represented in British public collections.<sup>31</sup> Throughout the 1970s he showed with the Waddington Galleries and exhibited in Germany and Italy. However, his exhibition record is not as marked as that for other non-figurative painters of his generation.<sup>32</sup> His work was included in only one group exhibition in America<sup>33</sup> and it is unsurprising that he failed to make an impression on the other side of the Atlantic. His success was largely confined to the Sixties and Europe; it is reasonable to claim that his career was steady rather than meteoric.

Robyn Denny

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Robyn Denny was born in 1930 and trained at St Martin's School of Art and the Royal College of Art, graduating from the RCA in 1957. A year later his work was shown at the radical London gallery, Gallery One. During the late Fifties he was closely associated with Lawrence Alloway and those who frequented the ICA. These contacts and his connection with the Situationist International art movement resulted in Denny being invited to mount the Place exhibition held at the ICA in 1959. The invitation to be one of the organisers for the 1960 Situation exhibition can be largely attributed to the critical success of the Place exhibition. Success soon followed. Adept at networking, Denny was able to take advantage of the available networks of influence and support systems enabling him to sustain a professional career. After initial commercial success and critical acclaim, he was taken up by the Kasmin Gallery in 1964<sup>34</sup> and showed with them throughout the decade until the gallery closed its doors in 1972. During the decade his work was written on extensively.<sup>35</sup> Among his supporters were Michael Fried, Norbert Lynton, Bryan Robertson and David Thompson. This critical acclaim continued throughout a long career and this undoubtedly assisted with sales. However, the market for his work was mainly in Europe, although two of his works – Graffiti 14 and Graffiti 15 - were acquired by New York's Museum of Modern Art in 1977.<sup>36</sup> Directors and curators of British public institutions recognised his achievements and this is reflected in their collections: there are over thirty major works in these collections.<sup>37</sup> The pinnacles of Denny's success were his selection for the 1966 Venice Biennale and a major retrospective of his work at the Tate Gallery in 1973.<sup>38</sup>

Paul Huxley

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Paul Huxley was born in 1938 and graduated from the Royal Academy Schools in 1960. In 1963 Huxley was invited to exhibit with the Rowan Gallery. Although he was not invited to participate in either of the Situation exhibitions, nevertheless, he was included, principally because of the advocacy of Bryan Robertson, in the New Generation exhibition of 1964 where, according to Wilson, Huxley 'was critically acclaimed and he received the first prize'.<sup>39</sup> Success followed. Reviewing Huxley's 1965 solo exhibition at the Rowan, the art critic Edward Lucie-Smith noted,

although Huxley's work displays a 'preoccupation with optical effects', nevertheless, he believed that ultimately he was 'a poser of questions...and the sense of risks being taken makes this a memorable exhibition'.<sup>40</sup> In the same year Huxley won a Harkness Fellowship, which enabled him to spend two years in New York; his first solo exhibition on that side of the Atlantic coincided with this award.<sup>41</sup>

His work received widespread media attention thereafter.<sup>42</sup> As importantly, it was the advocacy of Bryan Robertson, Norbert Lynton, and David Thompson which helped to shape and consolidate his career. His exhibition record is marked; with his work exhibited across Europe and on the other side of the Atlantic. A combination of media attention, advocacy and the opportunity to show his work regularly resulted in sales. Huxley is well-represented in British and international collections although there is an absence of his work in American collections.<sup>43</sup> Huxley has been able to sustain a career for over fifty years.

Albert Irvin

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Albert Irvin was born in 1922. During the Second World War he served in the Royal Air Force as a navigator, an experience that would later influence his painting.<sup>44</sup> In receipt of a State scholarship for returning servicemen, between 1946 and 1950 Irvin studied at Goldsmiths College in London. In 1950 his work was included in a group exhibition at the RBA Galleries in London. Albert Irvin's first solo London exhibition in 1961 at the New Art Centre came at the age of thirty nine, followed by a further exhibition there in 1963. Thereafter, his exhibition record in Britain was far from impressive and he sold little work.<sup>45</sup> His main source of income came from teaching, back at Goldsmiths College. Little was published on Irvin in the Sixties although his work did receive critical attention in art journals during the Seventies.<sup>46</sup> Notwithstanding, he had his supporters, mainly among fellow non-figurative painters.

He exhibited in Germany throughout the Seventies but it was not until the Gimpel Gallery started to show his work in the early Eighties that recognition and a modicum of commercial success came his way. This coincided with Irvin changing his painting style, switching to diluted acrylic and adopting a high-key colour palette. For as Tooby pointed out, 'his career defied every model of art-world success, but also characterised the struggles and ambitions of his generation'.<sup>47</sup>

John Plumb

Career Overview, 1960-1982

John Plumb was born in 1947 and studied with Victor Pasmore and William Turnbull at the Central School of Art in London. He emerged on to the London art scene in the late Fifties and as his reputation grew his work was featured in major exhibitions, including the 1960 and 1961 Situation exhibitions. But his early promise was not fully realised. In 1961 he had his one and only exhibition with the Molton Gallery and although afterwards was taken up by Marlborough Fine Art his fortunes proved no better there. He was included in only one group exhibition at the Marlborough before his contract was terminated. Thereafter, it is reasonable to claim that he did not receive the recognition his work possibly deserved. Fellow artist and critic, William Packer summed up the reasons for Plumb's failure to garner critical success: 'his misfortune was to be one among many similarly talented artists at a time when opportunities to show were far more limited than they are today... in those days Britain galleries were far thinner on the ground, and the market for modern art infinitely more constricted. Any successful gallery's stable was soon full, competition was fierce and the economics of the art world were unforgiving, leaving those artists not taken on, or soon cast off, to forage elsewhere as best they could'. Moreover, Plumb's temperament did not help his cause and he was 'unsettled to know what direction to take'.<sup>48</sup> Plumb drifted into teaching and his work slipped from view. Disillusioned, in 1977 Plumb abandoned abstraction and dedicated his efforts to teaching, although he later returned to non-figurative painting. The lack of support is reflected in the lack of attention to his work from public institutions; there are only five of his works in British public collections.<sup>49</sup>

Bridget Riley

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Bridget Riley was born in 1931 and studied at Goldsmiths College from 1949 to 1952. Throughout the Fifties her work was included in a number of group exhibitions. For a while Riley taught and worked for the advertising agency, J. Walter Thompson, but by 1964 the successful launch of her career enabled her to dedicate herself full-time to making art. In 1963 Bridget Riley was a John Moores and an AICA prize winner and a year later her work was included in the 1964 New Generation exhibition. But it was her contribution to MOMA's Responsive Eye exhibition of 1965 that consolidated her career on both sides of the Atlantic. A reproduction of one of her paintings, Movement in Squares (1961), was featured on the catalogue cover. Riley's art became the easily recognisable art of the Sixties; the look of her paintings was appropriated by the design industry, transcribed into fashion, graphics, and advertising imagery. But this had mixed blessings. She was a commercial success in the United States, her first solo exhibition sold out on the preview evening. Thereafter, she was represented by major dealers and her work was extensively shown. Appreciated by collectors and the public, Riley's work, however, had a mixed critical reception. It was dismissed, unfairly, by some critics for its appropriation by the design industries and deemed, at the time, too aligned to commercialism by some critics. The art historian Thomas Crow has observed, 'the 'Op' Art look was one of the most obvious examples of the increasing commercialisation of avant-garde art. Indeed it is difficult to think of another innovation in the fine arts that became so quickly assimilated into the commercial mainstream'.<sup>50</sup> But such criticism was unfair because she had little control over her intellectual property and she always claimed that her sole intention was to make art, not design. Although Riley was unhappy with the appropriation of her ideas nevertheless it did her reputation little harm.<sup>51</sup> Since her arrival on the art scene Riley has managed to sustain her career for over fifty years. This can be attributed partly to a marked exhibition record, partly to the support from the Karsten Schubert Gallery in London and the Pace Gallery in New York, and partly because of the innovative quality of her work. Today, her work fetches high prices in the secondary market.<sup>52</sup>

Michael Tyzack

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Michael Tyzack was born in Sheffield in 1933. He graduated from the Slade School of Fine Art in 1955 and immediately afterwards spent time in Paris. His work was not shown in Britain until the early Sixties. In 1965 he won the prestigious John Moores First Prize.<sup>53</sup> At the time he said that winning the John Moores was the 'transformative event' in his career.<sup>54</sup> The judges were the British St Ives painter Patrick Heron, the critic John Russell and, by special invitation, the American critic Clement Greenberg. The entry for the painting by the Walker Art Gallery notes, 'the exhibition reflected his (Greenberg's) advocacy of 'colour field' painting in which abstract artists created large, flat expanses of colour. This style dominated the exhibition'.<sup>55</sup> Unsurprisingly, interest in his work was at its peak shortly after winning the prize and his work was acquired for British public collections.<sup>56</sup> Winning the John Moores First Prize should have been the ideal platform from which to launch his career and this did occur for a short time but was not sustained. Until the end of the 1960s Tyzack enjoyed three solo exhibitions and his work was included in a number of group exhibitions but attention in his work gradually faded, exasperated by his decision to immigrate to the United States in 1971. Thereafter, his exhibition record was less marked and the decision to move abroad did little to develop his career. Between 1971 and 1982 he was without gallery representation. After 1971 his style did not seem to move on, and it seemed increasingly dated and he faded from view. In the United States he forged a sound teaching career but never fulfilled his early promise.

Marc Vaux

Career Overview, 1960-1982

Marc Vaux was born in 1932 and studied at studied at the Slade School of Fine Art from 1957 to 1960. Inclusion in the 1960 Situation exhibition announced his arrival on the London art scene. In 1963 he exhibited with his then wife, Tess Jaray, at the Grabowski Gallery. The catalogue entry was written by Jasia Reichardt, the then Assistant Director of the ICA. And, although he showed with Jaray at the Whitechapel Art Gallery in 1973, his career faltered thereafter. There were no subsequent major exhibitions of his work, no retrospective. There are few of his works in British public collections.<sup>57</sup> Of the seven works by Vaux in the Tate Collection<sup>58</sup>, only one, the relief SQ 6(1), was purchased, the others were gifts.<sup>59</sup> There is only one work by Vaux in the Arts Council Collection<sup>60</sup> and the British Council has three of his works, but only minor works on paper.<sup>61</sup> He managed, however, to forge a successful teaching career, culminating in his appointment as Head of Painting at Central Saint Martins College of Arts and Design.
