Preface

It's always amusing to hear left-wing critics assail the alleged right-wing bias of the media. Ordinary mortals know that this doesn't pass the laugh test. But some listeners to National Public Radio believe it. Anyway, since they can never point to actual evidence from the coverage itself, they point for proof to the "corporate" ownership of CNN, NBC and the rest. Their unstated premise is that if corporations are involved, we must be in the presence of right-wing influence.

Would that it were so. One hates to burst anyone's bubble, but most corporations are anything but conservative. The Capital Research Center has been following patterns of corporate philanthropy for 14 years, and has found that most companies and foundations give 4 times as much money to left-wing groups and causes than to right-wing ones - often to the disadvantage of the companies themselves. In 1997, the latest year for which data are available, corporations gave 4 times as much to left-leaning charities and public-policy advocates than to right-leaning ones. Corporations like Aetna, Merrill Lynch, Georgia Pacific and Target Stores - along with many others - donated $31.7 million to left-of-center groups advocating bigger government, more regulation and higher taxes, vs. only $8.1 million to groups advocating free market solutions, lower taxes and conservative reform.

In the aggregate, this works against the interests of the corporations themselves, that presumably prefer, if only for business reasons, lower taxes and less regulation. But in some cases, corporate giving is even more directly at odds with the interests of the corporations.

Leading automotive and oil companies, for example, heavily bankroll environmental groups that seek to impose greater regulation on their very industries. President Clinton's National Science and Technology Council, for example, released a report in 2000 on global warming that was heavily influenced by the World Wildlife Fund, the World Resources Institute and the Progressive Policy Institute's Center for Environmental Economics—all left-of-center groups advocating more regulation and higher taxes. The Clinton administration was certainly within its rights to issue such a report. But guess who sponsors the environmental groups who took such a large role? BP Amoco, DaimlerChrysler, Ford and General Motors.

Among the 10 largest recipients of corporate public affairs grants, nine are either liberal or leftist. These include the Brookings Institution, The Nature Conservancy, and the National Urban League. The one more conservative beneficiary is the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which is only center-right. The American Enterprise Institute (which leans right, but does host several center-left scholars) ranked 11th in terms of grants received.

Nearly all of the major corporate donors in America shy away from contributing to faith-based charities. There is no constitutional impediment to their making such grants. Nevertheless, GM gave only 2.3 percent of its gifts in 1997 to faith-based charities. The numbers were similar for other major donors like IBM, Citigroup (whose official explanation denies funds to religious groups "unless they are engaged in a significant project benefiting the whole community") and GE. Perhaps President Bush's emphasis on including faith-based organizations among those competing for government grants will alter this pattern.

Corporations are also highly vulnerable to intimidation and shakedowns. Jesse Jackson has perfected the art. Through his 501(c)(3), the Citizenship Education Fund, he has pressured major Wall Street firms to pony up contributions to himself and his friends on pain of lawsuits, boycotts and other forms of protest. AT&T, for example, contributed $425,000 to CEF after Mr. Jackson agreed to withdraw his opposition to a merger with TCI. AT&T also hired two companies associated with Mr. Jackson to manage billions of dollars in bond offerings.

Mr. Jackson pulled the same stunt when SBC and Ameritech proposed to merge. When Mr. Jackson withdrew his opposition, he pocketed $500,000 from each company.

The Capital Research Center found these corporate givers to be very secretive about their philanthropy. CRC had to resort to publicly available IRS data for most of its information.

But shareholders are not so handicapped. They can and should demand to know how boards of directors are fulfilling their duties. Is it possible that they, too, have bought the propaganda that corporations are right wing?

Summary Essay

A Mandate for Reform

Corporate support for big-government liberal advocacy groups is at an all-time high. This continuing trend underscores the debate over the role of charity sparked earlier this year by the Bush Administration. Lost in the controversy over taxpayer funding of faith-based institutions is a host of other issues, in particular the role that corporate philanthropy should play in expanding private-sector giving.

Businesses are an integral component of charitable giving. Many companies fund charities, and the profits they generate ultimately fuel grantmaking foundations. Yet Patterns of Corporate Philanthropy: A Mandate for Reform finds that many major corporations fund nonprofit political advocacy groups that work against the interests of free markets. Many support groups whose missions are inimical to the very system that allows businesses to thrive.

For fourteen years, Patterns has tracked philanthropic giving by the largest publicly held corporations in America. The survey focuses on a particular type of corporate giving: grants to political advocacy organizations. These include think tanks, environmental organizations, minority groups, and other organizations that seek to affect public policy.

Patterns examines corporate giving by the 250 largest publicly held companies (as ranked by Forbes magazine according to sales) to hundreds of public affairs organizations. Based on a 1-to-8, Left-to-Right rating scale, we rank companies according to the size of their grants and the ideology of recipient organizations. Table I shows the "Ten Best" and "Ten Worst" corporate givers for 1997. We rate CIGNA the best giver and PNC Bank the worst.

The year 1997 is the most recent for which we have comprehensive corporate giving data. Slow corporate reporting and lack of cooperation contributed to this delay. Fortunately, information technology is speeding this process and will help us erase the time-lag in the future.

As in the past, this year's Patterns finds that corporations in 1997 gave far more to organizations seeking bigger government than to those seeking less regulation, spending, and lower taxes. In fact, corporate funding to big-government organizations is at a near all-time high.

Findings

This year's study finds support for left-wing causes nearly matching 1996 levels. In 1996, the nonprofit Left successfully mined more corporate funding than ever before. For every $1.00 major corporations gave to conservative and free-market groups, they gave $4.61 to organizations seeking more government. Table II shows that the ratio is little changed for 1997: $4.41/Left versus $1.00/Right.

Table II

SECTION ONE

Last year's Patterns identified $38.7 million in corporate grants to left-of-center groups, compared to $8.4 million to right-of-center groups Right (see Table III). In 1997, companies continued to fund groups on the Right at approximately the same level: $35.7 million to the Left and $8.1 million to the Right. And as in the past, groups comprising what we identify as the "Establishment Left" received the most corporate grants: $31.7 million. Funding for this category accounts for 64 percent of the $49.3 million given to public affairs groups by major corporations. Table IV shows that nine of ten largest 1997 public affairs grant recipients were on the Left.

Total 1997 corporate funding to public affairs groups: $49.279 million
Funding Differential: $4.41/Left to $1/Right

Of the companies we evaluated, 45 gave at least $250,000 or more to public affairs groups, and 14 gave more than $1 million each. We gave letter grades to companies giving over $250,000 based on our calculation of their ideological giving patterns. For 1997 giving, no company earned an "A." Only CIGNA earned a "B," and there were eight "C"s, 31 "D"s, and five "F"s. In other words, 80 percent of the biggest corporate public affairs givers received a "D" or "F."

SECTION ONE

The "Ten Best" and "Ten Worst" corporate givers are taken from the letter grade list. Companies that made large gifts to public affairs groups are somewhat less polarized this year than last. All ranks in the "Ten Best" table have slightly lower ratings than in 1996, while every company on the 1997 "Ten Worst" list has a rating just a little better than the company in the same position last year. Sadly, the "Ten Best" list includes one "D" grade—Procter & Gamble—and six of the "Ten Worst" companies received "F" grades.

The lowest-rated giver is PNC Bank. This Pittsburgh-based bank earned a rating of 2.59 by making grants to radical groups like New Jersey Citizen Action and ACORN (Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now). PNC has stubbornly hovered on the "Ten Worst" list for years. The company's actual rating is practically unchanged from last year, but again the rankings on the "Ten Worst" list improved slightly in 1997.

The federally chartered mortgage lending company Freddie Mac, last year's worst "misgiver," improved its rating, as did Sara Lee. J.P. Morgan is not on this year's list because we found less than $250,000 in gifts to public affairs by that firm which has since been absorbed by Chase Manhattan. A few other companies on the 1996 "Ten Worst" list are also off this year's because they merged with other companies: Pacific Bell is now part of SBC; BankBoston merged into Fleet Financial to form Fleet Boston; and Travelers Group merged with Citicorp to form Citigroup. As with PNC Bank, giving by May Department Stores and Target Stores (formerly Dayton Hudson) either worsened or remained unchanged in 1997.

This year Allstate is the only company to make it out of the "Ten Worst" list because of improved giving. But the company still earned a "D" and a rating of 3.54/Center-Left. However, Allstate grants to Citizens for a Sound Economy and the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise took off some of the edge for its continued support for the Urban League and radical groups like the National Training & Information Center.

The Art of the Shakedown

Many advocacy groups win corporate funding by threatening lawsuits and boycotts and by petitioning government regulatory bodies. Regulatory policies, in particular, give corporations a built-in incentive to payoff left-wing activists. In effect, this rewards activist groups hostile to business. Finance and telecommunications companies are particularly vulnerable to activist pressure groups that intimidate and cajole them into making grants. This type of giving is likely to continue until new public policies reduce the incentives for corporate appeasement.

ACORN is a prime example of a corporate shakedown operation. It uses the Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) to pressure lending institutions into making low-interest loans. By threatening to use CRA provisions to hold up federal approval of bank mergers and acquisitions, ACORN, its affiliates, and other ACORN-like groups have forced banks to make billions of dollars in high-risk loans. These agreements often include hefty payoffs to activist groups that file the complaints. In 1997 alone, ACORN affiliates across the country secured $385,000 in contributions from leading companies.

In 1999, ACORN and other groups received a pledge from BankAmerica and NationsBank to provide $350 billion over the next ten years in low-income and minority loans. Activists also secured a ten-year pledge of $115 billion from the merger of Citicorp and Travelers. To avoid regulatory complications, both "community-reinvestment" pledges were made on the day each merger was announced. Yet these payoffs often backfire. Many of the same banks that fund ACORN and its allies find themselves battling the same groups over issues like proposed "living wage" laws and local restrictions on automatic teller machine fees. Recently, ACORN even attacked New York City's efforts to reform failing schools. ACORN's groundless accusations of racism and exploitation on the part of Edison Schools, Inc. convinced parents in five of city's worst public schools to vote against Edison's plan to run them as charter schools.

Threats of boycotts and lawsuits also generate corporate misgiving. Rev. Jesse Jackson is the most accomplished practitioner of this type of philanthropic manipulation. Example: in 1997, Jackson's Rainbow/PUSH Coalition netted $2 million from Viacom and other communications companies by petitioning the Federal Communications Commission to block mergers and deny broadcast licenses on the basis of alleged racial discrimination.

SECTION ONE

Earlier this year CRC released a major report on Jackson and his myriad organizations. Author Patrick Reilly investigated Jackson's tactics in the April 2001 issue of Organization Trends. He explained why they work: "Up to now, corporate leaders have found it easier to make quiet contributions to Jackson's nonprofits than to engage him in public battles." In recent years, Jackson's principal vehicle for corporate fundraising has been the Wall Street Project—a New York City office sponsored by his 501(c)(3) Citizenship Education Fund (CEF). The Project pressures major companies, particularly financial-services firms, into accepting racial preferences in hiring and making investments favored by Jackson. More often than not, Jackson's corporate targets cooperate and sponsor his organizations or his allies along the way. Thus CEF benefits directly from the Wall Street Project and from similar operations in Chicago, Cleveland, Los Angeles, and Silicon Valley.

Reilly exposes several companies duped by Jackson's shakedown. The rash of telecommunications mergers in 1999 was particularly lucrative for Jackson's operation. These companies would rather pay a toll to Jackson than risk his interference before the public and the FCC:

- AT&T gave $425,000 to CEF in 1999 after Jackson withdrew his opposition to AT&T's merger with TCI. AT&T subsequently hired two companies associated with Jackson to manage billions of dollars in bond offerings. Both bond-managers turned out to be donors to CEF.
- Jackson endorsed the SBC-Ameritech merger, but only after both companies gave CEF $500,000. Jackson previously opposed the merger.
- Bell Atlantic donated $1 million to Jackson groups after Jackson publicly endorsed the GTE-Bell Atlantic merger into Verizon. The new company also pledged $300,000 to Jackson's groups over three years.

Of course, Jackson's own personal and financial scandals might make him a less attractive prospect for corporate philanthropy. Yet his model lives on. His former protégé, Rev. Al Sharpton, and others already emulate him. Jackson's past success only demonstrates how pliant companies can be when they wish to avoid criticism.

Corporate-Backed Environmentalism

Corporate support for the environmental movement deserves a special focus. The sad truth is that corporate donations to pro-regulation environmentalists lead to more regulation of companies making these grants. The cost of this foolish behavior is eventually passed on to consumers.

The issue of global warming is a case in point. Last year, CRC discovered that leading automotive and oil companies were bankrolling environmental groups working closely with the Clinton Administration to support more regulation of the automotive and oil industries. In June 2000, President Clinton's National Science and Technology Council (NSTC)-which included representatives of several corporate-backed liberal environmental groups-released a report detailing the findings of the National Assessment on Climate Change that analyzed the potential consequences of climate variability and its impact on the United States. Examining how to adapt to climate change, the report called for yet another "public-private partnership."

The Assessment, which contains data from U.S. and foreign government agencies, also relies on information obtained from environmental groups. An appendix to the Assessment acknowledges their representatives for help in preparing the report. They include Kathryn Fuller of the World Wildlife Fund (WWF), Anthony Janetos of the World Resources Institute (WRI), and Debra Knopman of the Progressive Policy Institute's (PPI) Center for Environmental Economics. Each of these organizations advocates higher energy taxes and command-and-control regulations that harm both the automotive and oil industries.

The Washington, D.C.-based Competitive Enterprise Institute recently filed a lawsuit against the NSTC alleging that the Council politicized its work by holding meetings that were closed to the public and spent appropriated money to publish a report before completing a full scientific inquiry. Why then are BP Amoco, DaimlerChrysler, Ford, and General Motors supporters of groups participating in the National Assessment? BP Amoco gave WRI $40,000 in 1996 and 1997, and PPI received $30,000 from 1996 to 1998. DaimlerChrysler gave WWF $20,000 in 1996 and 1997. Ford gave $200,000 to WWF in 1996 and 1997 and $149,621 to WRI from 1996 to 1998. GM gave WWF $35,000 in 1997.

Faith-Based Charity: Corporate Philanthropy's Blind Spot

Even though big-government advocacy groups are far from what most people consider charity, corporate support for them persists. Traditional charities serve people in need and seek the betterment of local communities. Many of the most effective charities are religious or depend primarily on volunteers. These organizations, not advocacy groups, deserve a higher priority in corporate giving.

The current debate over government funding of faith-based organizations (FBOs) seems to turn on the interpretation of the First Amendment. All sides agree that it is at least fair to ask under what conditions government grants might constitute an unwarranted establishment of a public religion.

Unfortunately, most major companies behave as if their own grantmaking decisions are similarly limited by the First Amendment. This kind of behavior is misguided and harmful to effective charities. Too many of the best charities are not considered for corporate funding simply because they are faith-based. To understand this development, CRC recently examined the philanthropy of the ten largest U.S. corporations (ranked by sales). We searched for grants to FBOs.

We found that six of the ten companies explicitly ban or restrict grant-making to religious institutions. Some companies seemed unaware that many charities are effective precisely because their programs are religious. In any event, they barred grants to such groups. AT&T only funds groups that are "nonsectarian and nondenominational." Citigroup refuses to fund religious institutions "unless they are engaged in a significant project benefiting the entire community." Ford does not support "religious or sectarian programs for religious purposes." Not surprisingly, grants to FBOs make up a miniscule percentage of overall corporate giving. (See Table V.)

Wal-Mart deserves special mention because it is an anomaly among corporations. We found that nearly every other Wal-Mart grant goes to a church or ministry. The 1999 Wal-Mart Foundation annual report shows hundreds of small donations (but not amounts) to religious ministries like "Apostolic Lighthouse Church Youth," "Bay Free Church Men's Retreat," and "Braham Evangelical Lutheran Church Sunday School." However, the foundation's grants were too small to show up on the Foundation Center's FC Search.

Reforming Corporate Philanthropy

Since our founding in 1984, CRC has criticized philanthropy that promotes the growth of government. A government that over-regulates, imposes high taxes, and encourages welfare dependency does not complement genuine charities—it crowds them out. Earlier this year we released Mandate for Charity: Policy Proposals for the Bush Administration, a catalogue of recommendations for getting government out of charity's way. Mandate promotes changes in federal policy that will make charity more effective, more accountable, and more abundant.

Mandate's proposals for corporate philanthropy follow a premise that the Patterns study has recognized for years: when corporate managers fund advocates of big government, they undermine traditional charities and they weaken the economic and social system that makes it possible for business to flourish.

Corporate leaders cheat their shareholders when they fund a political agenda of new regulations, increased taxes and government spending on ineffective social programs. Not surprisingly, many companies are unwilling to tell shareholders about their giving. Yet corporate philanthropy deserves shareholder scrutiny. Every corporate dollar given to nonprofits is a dollar not directly reinvested in the company or returned to shareholders. Because a corporation's principal aim should be to serve shareholders' interests, it should be open about its grantmaking—and its reasons for grantmaking.

Mandate urges the Administration and Congress to give shareholders more influence over company giving. In particular, federal law should require publicly-owned companies to identify the nonprofits they fund. Congress should also prohibit corporations from contributing to a nonprofit in exchange for its agreement to petition a government regulatory agency. FCC and Federal Reserve regulations on telecommunication and bank mergers and acquisitions give Jesse Jackson, ACORN, and other activists too much power.

Mandate also seeks to advantage direct-services charities. Federal law should encourage companies to allow employees more time on the clock for company-sponsored community service and more time off for voluntarism. Tax laws and civil codes should also encourage in-kind giving. Companies should receive more tax incentives and increased liability protection for making contributions.

Shareholders will have to receive more information for these reforms to be effective. Regrettably, corporations rarely disclose their grants to nonprofits. Only the fraction made by company-sponsored foundations is in the public domain.

What Are They Hiding?

CRC faces these barriers to public disclosure each year when we assemble Patterns of Corporate Philanthropy. Last year 150 of the 250 companies we surveyed failed to respond to written requests for giving data. When we telephoned, 70 companies declined to participate and many others failed to return messages. A mere 57 companies voluntarily provided information for the study, and only 30 provided all giving data we requested. We relied primarily on IRS data that is publicly available.

Company literature is long on platitudes and short on detail. Georgia-Pacific, Intel, and Target Stores fail to itemize grants. Johnson & Johnson and Home Depot describe sample grants but provide no data. This is precisely the kind of information that should be available to shareholders. Company grantmaking should never be contrary to the investor's interest or carried out without the investor's knowledge.

If the Bush Administration and Congress can prompt more disclosure of corporate philanthropy, we might expect an increase in giving to effective charities as well as win-win practices like workplace community service, company-sponsored scholarships, employee-directed matching gift programs, and cause-related marketing. In other words, reformed corporate philanthropy will promote the shared interests of stockholders, management, employees, customers, and affected communities.

SECTION ONE

information for 1998 and 1999, but 1997 is the latest year for which comprehensive information is available. Shifts in Forbes rankings, mergers, and spin-offs change the composition of the Forbes 250 list by about 20 companies each year. The size of the sample and the consistent inclusion of leading companies ensure a representative picture of corporate giving preferences.

Mergers particularly complicate the process of gathering data. Combinations among the largest companies have increased dramatically in the last few years. Several companies in the 1997 Forbes 250 sample no longer exist because other companies have purchased them. The new companies, almost without exception, rarely provide information on the giving history of the companies they buy.

Capital Research Center President Terrence Scanlon wrote each Forbes 250 company (or its new owner) requesting an itemized list of all 1997 grants made to 501(c)(3) organizations, as well as total 1997 contribution amounts. Researchers followed up with telephone and e-mail contact. The "Source/Notes" portion of each corporation profile describes this correspondence.

When corporations ignored our requests or provided insufficient data, Capital Research Center relied on data available through FC Search, the Foundation Center's searchable CD-ROM database of foundation grants. FC Search mostly covers private foundations, but the program also tracks grants by corporate foundations and a few direct corporate giving programs. One major limitation of FC Search is the absence of grants under $10,000.

Capital Research Center also sought the 1997 990-PF tax forms for over 150 corporate foundations. The website GuideStar.org offers many of these forms for downloading. Though silent on direct corporate giving, a typical 990-PF form reports total foundation contribution amounts and includes an itemized list of foundation grants to 501(c)(3) organizations.

Researchers searched these sources for contributions to about 1,000 nonprofit public affairs organizations or their affiliates. Wherever possible, in-kind donations listed without dollar-value and employee-directed matching gifts are excluded from the study. Grant recipients and dollar amounts were entered into a computer database and grant recipients were assigned a rating according to an 8-point scale. The scale identifies political ideology from Left to Right:

Capital Research Center averages the ratings of a company's grant recipients, weighted by the dollar amounts of individual grants. Company giving-pattern ratings are based on these weighted averages. For instance, if a company contributed two grants of $100 each to two groups rated 8-Market Right and a single grant of $1000 to one group rated 3-Liberal, its giving-pattern rating would be "3.83-Liberal."¹

An explanation of the 8-point scale is warranted. The use of this numerical device has been controversial although such instruments are common in social science research. The scale does not reflect a statistical bell-curve, but instead places public affairs organizations on a political spectrum. Of course, political ideology is more complicated than any Left-Right continuum. However, the Patterns scale focuses specifically on government's effect on business and the overall economy. The study lists grants to public affairs groups dealing with single issues such as immigration, gun control, abortion, and foreign policy, but does not rate them on the 8-point scale. Capital Research Center obviously has its own point of view. Other organizations are welcome to develop their own scales.

Establishment Left (ratings of 3-Liberal and 4-Center-Left). This constitutes the largest segment of public affairs organizations surveyed in Patterns, and includes over half those monitored. The Establishment Left favors government action to stimulate the economy and solve social ills, strengthening of the state-monopoly on education, high taxes, further regulation of private industry and regulation by litigation. These groups bolster the political offices and bureaucratic agencies that serve their interests. Many represent constituencies that directly benefit from government programs. They include well-financed environmental groups like the Nature Conservancy, public health advocates like the American Cancer Society, and race and ethnicity-based advocacy groups like the National Urban League. The Urban League secured $3.9 million from major corporations in 1997, making it the top recipient of corporate public affairs money for the third year running. Groups rated 4-Center-Left support incremental expansion of the public sector, but are more pragmatic and friendlier to business-interests. They support free trade and favor “public-private partnerships” and include the Brookings Institution and conservation research groups like Resources for the Future.

Centrist (rating 5-Center). These public affairs groups are neutral or bipartisan, favor “good-government” reforms, and advocate policy changes that are non-controversial or procedural. The National Center for State Courts and the nonprofit RAND Corporation are two 5-Center think tanks that enjoy substantial corporate support. Centrist groups often try to avoid taking sides on current issues of political controversy.

Establishment Right (rating 6-Center-Right). “Pro-business, not necessarily pro-market” could be a motto for the Establishment Right. Less than twenty organizations have a 6-Center-Right rating, but this category includes two of the largest beneficiaries of corporate philanthropy. The Center for Strategic and International Studies and the combined Chambers of Commerce rank 5th and 16th, respectively, in amount of corporate support (see Table IV). These two groups typically account for two thirds of all corporate funding to the Establishment Right. Center-Right organizations generally favor less government, but they are cautious about systematic free market reform. They support tort reform, a strong national defense, public education reform, and would boost spending on public infrastructure. Establishment Right groups support the tactical interests of big business, but fear of the unpredictable prevents them from fully embracing free market principles.

Change-Oriented Right (ratings of 7-Conservative and 8-Market-Right). Capital Research Center believes that when corporations support nonprofits in this category they are acting in their long-term best interests. The Change-Oriented Right includes a little under one-fifth of the organizations monitored by Patterns, but these groups receive only 10 percent of the corporate philanthropy devoted to public affairs. These organizations would radically reduce government programs and have their functions performed by private institutions in civil society. Groups rated 7-Conservative like the American Enterprise Institute and the Family Research Council have offered powerful criticisms of U.S. policies and their harmful effects on American communities and families. Groups with an 8-Market-Right rating emphasize freedom and smaller government as the essential elements of social prosperity. The most influential of these groups, the Heritage Foundation and Cato Institute, rank only 32nd and 53rd, respectively, in corporate support for nonprofit public affairs organizations.

We attach letter grades to the giving-pattern ratings when companies contribute $250,000 or more to nonprofit public affairs groups. Letter grades are A = 6.50 - 8.00; B = 5.50 - 6.49; C = 4.50 - 5.49; D = 3.00 - 4.49; F = 1.00 - 2.99.

Capital Research Center designates as “Traditional” any company whose complete contributions data reveals no grants to nonprofit public affairs groups. Companies rarely provide Capital Research Center with itemized lists of both direct and foundation giving. A company earning a “Traditional” label makes no grants or limits its philanthropy to what we consider traditional charities, i.e. those charities that provide direct services to individuals and communities. If partial contributions data (which usually includes information on a company’s foundation giving, but lacks details about direct grants) reveals no grants to nonprofit public affairs groups, we designate the company as “Traditional/Partial Data.”

Occasionally corporate contributions data contains a detailed list of recipient organizations but no dollar amounts. In this case the company’s giving-pattern is labeled “Insufficient Data,” but its profile also includes an unweighted average of recipient ratings.

SECTION ONE

Some companies receiving the “Insufficient Data” label may actually have traditional giving patterns. These grant-makers tend to concentrate on local charity. Some local groups are actually affiliates of large public affairs organizations (e.g. the American Cancer Society and Chamber of Commerce), but community charities are by-and-large apolitical. In-kind donations, i.e. gifts of goods or services instead of money, are another mark of traditional giving. These donations are well suited for organizations that provide direct services to the needy. Corporate grant-makers also like in-kind donations because their tax-deductibility often exceeds the cost of production.

Section III of this study lists corporate public affairs grants according to grant recipient. Contributions to parent and affiliate organizations are combined under the name of the parent entity. For example, grants to the New Orleans affiliate of the NAACP are listed under “NAACP.” The group's rating on the 8-point scale and dollar amounts for each grant, where available, are also listed.² Table IV above lists the “Top 40” public affairs groups receiving the most corporate funding in the Patterns survey.

Source/Notes: Prior to the start of this study, AT&T provided a contributions report covering 1997. The report was insufficient for the purposes of this study. AT&T grants data covering several years was also downloaded from the company's website prior to the start of this study. While the AT&T's website reported grants made by the AT&T Foundation, it failed to list contributions made directly by AT&T. In a letter postmarked April 6, 2000, AT&T Foundation Executive Director Timothy J. McClimon declined to provide further information: "Listings of corporate contributions and product donations are not available." In a voicemail message left April 17, 2000, another AT&T official also declined to provide further information and referred inquiries back to AT&T's website: "You'll see all the information that AT&T publishes for public consumption, okay, if it's not there it's not published." FC Search also provided 1997 grants data for the AT&T Foundation. The distinct sums of all 1997 grants made by AT&T and the AT&T Foundation are not available. However, for the AT&T Foundation, FC Search reports figures of $37,738,769 and $46,066,194 for 1996 and 1998, respectively. Mr. McClimon's letter indicated that the combined grants of AT&T and the AT&T Foundation for 1997 amount to $64,600,000.

Source/Notes: Prior to the start of this study, Sara Lee provided its 1996 and 1997 combined contributions report. The report merged 1996 and 1997 giving data and was therefore insufficient for the purposes of the study. Sara Lee failed to respond to written requests for more detailed 1997 giving data. In a telephone conversation July 14, 2000, a Sara Lee representative agreed to send more detailed information. As of the printing of this study, Capital Research Center has received no further information from Sara Lee. Sara Lee's contributions report lists total direct corporate giving for both 1996 and 1997 as $16,300,000. For the purposes of this study Capital Research Center halves that figure, and estimates total direct corporate giving at $8,150,000 for 1996 and 1997 respectively. Capital Research Center also downloaded the 1997 990-PF filed by the Sara Lee Foundation from GuideStar.org.
