Benefits of Scholarly Sharing Platforms

Pro	Con
Good for dissemination	Fear of lack of rigor
Reaching a broad audience	Gaming the system
Visualization of impact from citations and downloads	Doesn't measure research but promotional activities such as Facebook and Twitter
Peer recognition	Not a central tool of the discipline
Part of scientific activity	Rewards the outgoing
Demonstrates interest and awareness of research	Time consuming
Scholarly sharing platforms expected to become more important over time	Better to focus on publication in traditional peer-reviewed journals

Elsevier Solicits Take Downs

Mike Edwards

Publisher Elsevier Requires Scholars to Take Down Their Research

In late 2013, academic publisher Elsevier demanded that universities and the academic network Academia.edu take down scholars' copies of their own research that they had shared online. As is the practice with many academic journal publishers, scholars often relinquish copyright to their articles when those articles are published with Elsevier.

As Andrea Peterson relates, Elsevier sent takedown notices "to the University of Calgary, the University of California-Irvine, and Harvard University" in addition to those sent to Academia.edu, and "[i]n these cases, Elsevier is within its legal rights to demand the material be taken down." Peterson reports the account of Academia.edu CEO Richard Price, who notes that "[o]nly very recently did Elsevier start sending take-downs in batches of thousands." Washington Post reporter Jennifer Howard offers the account of the University of Exeter's Guy Leonard, whose article was taken down by Academia.edu: "The takedown notice had made him rethink where he would choose to publish in the future, Mr. Leonard said. 'If I have any say in the next

Copyright and ResearchGate

We respect the intellectual property rights of others and ask that you do so as well. Our platform enables the private archiving and public posting of various types of content. When you post content, we must insist that you archive or publish content only if you have the right to do so. This applies to both your own profile as well as other places on the platform, such as Q&A and projects. As we do not have any information about rights you may hold, or any license terms or other restrictions which might apply to such content, we necessarily rely on you to understand your rights and act accordingly. For this reason, we request that you fully investigate and confirm that you have sufficient rights to post particular content to ResearchGate before you post such content. As a general matter, if you are an author publishing in a journal, you may be allowed to publish certain versions of your article, but not others, and privately share certain content with others. However, many journals restrict publication of final versions and impose limitations on private sharing.

Your starting point for understand your rights is the agreement(s) you have with your publisher or other rights owner. There are other resources available that you might also find useful in understanding your rights including:
