Groundwork For Reconciliation

Should you miss me, I am camped on a little-known X where the forest campaigns for painlessly-extracted promises.

How lightly I have learned to walk into the soft shrug of another summer;

to dance in the sun's rotunda; to entwine in the terminal hug of dusk;

to scatter unread copies of the previous season's breadth and width.

Nor will I hammock the buttocks of fat ladies;

nor countenance thinly-nursed faces of theorists dying of academic constriction;

nor take part in poorly-organized hunts for esthetic foliage.

Maybe if you can manage some comic relationship burlesquing the beginning of September, you will have a start into what is flying windward in my mind.

A Thin Mist Between Boulders

Ilka says it is best to halt at the sight of days that will not wake to songs of birds; and stone markers that do not step aside to let you pass.

- 28 -